10 COMPLEMENTARY PROTECTION

Introduction.................................................................................................................10-3
Addressing claims under s 36(2)(aa) .........................................................................10-4
Receiving country..........................................................................................................10-6
Assessing the risk of harm ...........................................................................................10-6
  Real risk ....................................................................................................................10-7
  Substantial grounds for believing .............................................................................10-8
  A necessary and foreseeable consequence ..............................................................10-9
  Sur place claims .........................................................................................................10-9
  Modified conduct to avoid threat of harm ...............................................................10-10
Significant harm ..........................................................................................................10-12
  Arbitrary deprivation of life ......................................................................................10-13
  The death penalty will be carried out .......................................................................10-15
  Torture ......................................................................................................................10-16
    An act or omission ..................................................................................................10-17
    Severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental .............................................10-17
    Intentionally inflicted ............................................................................................10-18
    Purpose ..................................................................................................................10-18
Cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment .................................................................10-20
  An act or omission ..................................................................................................10-21
  (Severe) pain or suffering .........................................................................................10-21
  An act or omission which... could reasonably be regarded as cruel or inhuman in nature .................................................................10-21
  Intention ..................................................................................................................10-22
  Act or omission not inconsistent with art 7 ............................................................10-22
Degrading treatment or punishment ......................................................... 10-23
An act or omission .................................................................................. 10-24
Extreme humiliation which is unreasonable ............................................. 10-24
Intention .................................................................................................... 10-25
Act or omission not inconsistent with art 7 ............................................. 10-26
Lawful sanctions ...................................................................................... 10-26
Perpetrator of the harm ........................................................................... 10-28
Self-harm or harm not resulting from actions of others ......................... 10-28
Harm caused by removing the applicant from Australia ....................... 10-28
Circumstances in which there is taken not to be a real risk .................... 10-30
Relocation .................................................................................................. 10-31
Protection from an authority ..................................................................... 10-32
A risk faced by the population generally ............................................... 10-33
Protection of a third country .................................................................... 10-35
Ineligibility for grant of a protection visa ............................................... 10-36
Crimes against peace, war crimes, crimes against humanity, serious nonpolitical crimes and acts contrary to purposes and principles of UN........... 10-36
Danger to the Australian community ..................................................... 10-37
10 COMPLEMENTARY PROTECTION

Introduction

Section 36(2)(aa) of the Migration Act 1958 (Cth) (the Act) provides that a criterion for a protection visa is that the applicant for the visa is:

a non-citizen in Australia (other than a non-citizen mentioned in paragraph (a)) in respect of whom the minister is satisfied Australia has protection obligations because the Minister has substantial grounds for believing that, as a necessary and foreseeable consequence of the non-citizen being removed from Australia to a receiving country, there is a real risk that the non-citizen will suffer significant harm.

This criterion is subject to a number of qualifications. The types of harm that will amount to ‘significant harm’ are exhaustively defined in ss 36(2A) and 5(1) of the Act, and s 36(2B) sets out circumstances in which there is taken not to be a real risk that a non-citizen will suffer significant harm. Section 36(2C) further provides for circumstances in which a non-citizen is taken not to satisfy the criterion in s 36(2)(aa), and s 36(3) sets out circumstances in which Australia is taken not to have protection obligations in respect of a non-citizen.

The criterion in s 36(2)(aa) was intended to introduce greater efficiency, transparency and accountability into Australia’s arrangements for adhering to its non-refoulement obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights Aiming at the Abolition of the Death Penalty (‘Second Optional Protocol’), Convention on the Rights of the Child (‘CROC’) and Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (‘CAT’).

The criterion in s 36(2)(aa) is referred to as ‘complementary protection’, being additional to Australia’s obligations under the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees (together, the Refugees Convention). Section 36(2)(aa) applies only to a non-citizen in Australia other than a non-citizen mentioned in paragraph (a). That is, it can only be met once the decision-maker is satisfied... that the non-citizen is not a person in respect of whom Australia has protection obligations as a refugee in accordance with s 36(2)(a).5

The various tests used in the complementary protection criterion in s 36(2)(aa) and related provisions draw, in part, on the language of the ICCPR, Second Optional Protocol and CAT, and on international jurisprudence applying and interpreting those instruments. However, s 36 does not purport to incorporate the non-refoulement obligations arising under those instruments; nor generally speaking do the terms of s 36 directly replicate the tests used in those instruments or the associated jurisprudence. In MIAC v MZYYL the Full Federal Court emphasised that while international interpretation of non-refoulement obligations arising from those instruments may be relevant and informative to the extent that those instruments contain similar terms to those in s 36, it is not necessary or useful to assess how those instruments would apply to the circumstances of a case.6 Reference must be to the terms of s 36 itself. The terms of s 36(2)(aa) and its related provisions evidence that the complementary protection provisions were intended to give effect only to a subset of Australia’s obligations under relevant international instruments, including CAT and the ICCPR.7

In addition, in accordance with Ministerial Direction No 84 – Consideration of Protection Visa applications, the Tribunal must take account of the Department of Home Affairs’ ‘Complementary Protection Guidelines’ to the extent that they are relevant to the decision under consideration.8 For further discussion see Chapter 12 – Merits review of Protection visa decisions. This chapter will consider each of the elements in the s 36(2)(aa) criterion and related provisions in turn.

Addressing claims under s 36(2)(aa)

After considering an applicant’s claims against the refugee criterion, the decision-maker must then consider those claims, and any of its own findings that leave alive a basis for... applying the complementary protection criterion, against the criterion in s 36(2)(aa). Merely because material is put by an applicant as giving rise to a claim on Refugees Convention grounds, it does not automatically follow that the claim is required to be considered as a claim for complementary protection. While there is no formula to assess whether the case put has sufficiently raised a claim for consideration under the complementary protection criterion, relevant matters to be taken into account are whether or not the claim for complementary protection clearly arises from the materials and, where the claimant is represented by professional advisors, whether the advisors have articulated the claim.

The level of detail required when considering s 36(2)(aa) will depend upon the circumstances of the case and factors such as: the particular claims made by the applicant; whether the factual basis underlying the applicant’s claims has been rejected; where it has been accepted that the applicant may face harm, why the applicant was nonetheless found not to meet the refugee criterion; and the ability of the applicant to understand why their application has been refused. There will not necessarily be any error in the decision-maker referring to its earlier findings of fact, particularly where those findings leave no factual basis for the claims. However, where the earlier findings reject claims for reasons specific to the refugee criterion, for instance because they do not involve serious harm or harm for a Convention reason, refusing claims under s 36(2)(aa) by reference to those findings may lead to error. Ultimately, what is required in each case will depend on the particular facts and the reasoning of the decision-maker.

---

9 SZRLK v MIAC [2012] FMCA 1155 at [44]. Note, however, that it may not always be strictly necessary for the Tribunal to structure its findings to consider s 36(2)(aa) only after first concluding that s 36(2)(a) is not met. In MZZDC v MIMAC [2013] FCCA 1395 the Tribunal’s findings on complementary protection were concurrent with its refugee findings and the Court did not find any error in that approach: at [26].
10 SZSHK v MIBP [2013] FCACF 125 at [37].
11 SZSHK v MIBP [2013] FCACF 125 at [37]. See also SZSSL v MIBP [2013] FCCA 2017 (Judge Nicholls, 28 November 2013), where the Court found that a particular claim had not been made under s 36(2)(aa), having regard to the fact that the applicant was represented by an experienced migration lawyer who made detailed submissions, and that the applicant himself did not give evidence his ‘refugee’ claims also went to significant harm: at [66]–[67], [74]–[75] and [86]–[87]. However contrast SZSRV v MIAC [2013] FCCA 1712 at [64] and [68]–[70] where the Court found that all of the applicant’s claims, not only those made with specific reference to s 36(2)(aa), arose on the material for consideration under that criterion.
13 SZSGA v MIMAC [2013] FCA 774 at [55]–[56]. See also CDY15 v MIBP [2018] FCA 175, where the Court held that no error arose from the Tribunal’s reliance upon its rejection of the claimed Convention-related motivation of the appellant’s alleged attackers where the question of motivation was relevant to whether he would face significant harm in the future: at [37]–[39]. CDY15 was followed in AOS18 v MIBP [2019] FCA 327 at [66]–[71], upheld on appeal in AOS18 v MIBP [2019] FCACF 140 at [16]. See also SZTOP v MIBP (2015) 232 FCR 452 at [36]; BZADO v MIBP [2014] FCCA 2981 at [27]–[28] and [33]–[34]. MZIA v MIBP [2014] FCCA 717 at [50]–[56]; SZTFL v MIBP [2014] FCCA 1620 at [29] and [41] (upheld on appeal in SZTFL v MIBP [2015] FCA 1323.
14 SZRLK v MIAC [2012] FMCA 1155 at [44] where the Court found that the Tribunal’s own refusal to characterise any part of the past persecution of the applicant as Convention-related left alive a claim that the applicant would face significant harm, requiring consideration under s 36(2)(aa). Similarly, in SZSFK v MIAC [2013] FCCA 7 the Court held that given that the reviewer rejected certain claims under the Refugees Convention for reasons specific to the Convention, it was not open to the reviewer to say that the complementary protection claim was rejected for the same reasons: at [92]. The Court cautioned that the use of language drawn from the refugee criterion context (in that case, ‘systematic’) may suggest error if used in relation to the complementary protection criterion: at [97]. See also SZTGN v MIBP [2014] FCCA 1467 at [45]–[47]; MZZOE v MIBP [2014] FCCA 1642 at [21]–[30]; SZURK v MIBP [2015] FCCA 472 at [48]. Contrast SZTBD v MIBP [2013] FCCA 2182 at [40] where the Court found there was no error in the Tribunal referring in its consideration of complementary protection to factual findings set out earlier in the decision record where those factual findings were not ‘bound up’ with Refugees Convention-related thinking; and SZUDL v MIBP [2014] FCCA 2018, which distinguished SZSFK on the basis that the Tribunal’s findings of fact were not reliant on Refugees Convention concepts: at [71]–[97].
Receiving country

As with claims under the refugee criterion, the first issue to be determined for claims under s 36(2)(aa) will generally be the country of reference. The criterion in s 36(2)(aa) refers to a risk of harm as a necessary and foreseeable consequence of the non-citizen being removed from Australia to a ‘receiving country’.

Receiving country is defined in s 5(1) of the Act as:

(a) a country of which the non-citizen is a national, to be determined solely by reference to the law of the relevant country; or
(b) if the non-citizen has no country of nationality – a country of his or her former habitual residence, regardless of whether it would be possible to return the non-citizen to the country.

For protection visa applications made before 16 December 2014, the wording of this definition was slightly different, particularly for stateless persons.

The definition of ‘receiving country’ is discussed further in Chapter 2 – Country of reference.

Assessing the risk of harm

There are three elements that must be established for prospective harm to meet the criterion in s 36(2)(aa): the Minister (or the Tribunal on review) must have substantial grounds for believing that as a necessary and foreseeable consequence of the non-citizen being removed from Australia, there is a real risk that the non-citizen will suffer significant harm. The criterion contains similarities with, but does not precisely replicate, complementary protection tests used in other jurisdictions.

While all three elements must be satisfied to meet the criterion, they may involve similar considerations, and findings applicable to one may inform the assessment of another. The interwoven nature of these elements is demonstrated by the statement in the Explanatory Memorandum that:

[a] real risk of significant harm is one where the harm is a necessary and foreseeable consequence of removal. The risk must be assessed on grounds that go beyond mere theory and suspicion but does not have to meet the test of being highly probable. The danger of harm must be personal and present.

---

16 The definition was amended by the Migration and Maritime Powers Legislation Amendment (Resolving the Asylum Legacy Caseload) Act 2014 (Cth), to enable its application to the new statutory framework relating to refugees introduced by that Act (the definition was previously only relevant to questions of complementary protection): paragraph 1324 of the Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration and Maritime Powers Legislation Amendment (Resolving the Asylum Legacy Caseload) Bill 2014. Before this amendment, ‘receiving country’ was defined in s 5(1) of the Act as follows:

(a) a country of which the non-citizen is a national; or
(b) if the non-citizen has no country of nationality – the country of which the non-citizen is a habitual resident; to be determined solely by reference to the law of the relevant country.

17 Most particularly, the United Nations Human Rights Committee’s General Comment 31 is similarly expressed, stating that the ICCPR ‘entails an obligation not to ... remove a person from their territory, where there are substantial grounds for believing that there is a real risk of irreparable harm’: Human Rights Committee, General Comment No 31: The Nature of the General Legal Obligation Imposed on States Parties to the Covenant, 80th sess, UN Doc CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.13 (26 May 2004) at [12] (‘General Comment 31’). In MIAC v Anochie (2012) 209 FCR 497 at [45] the Court stated that the Committee’s interpretation of the ICCPR was admissible in the construction of that Covenant.

18 Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 (Cth) at [67]. Similarly, the
The test under s 36(2)(aa) is a forward-looking one of reasonable foreseeability and the preferable view appears to be that the act (from which the relevant harm arises, i.e. pain, suffering and/or humiliation) must occur in the future,\(^\text{19}\) notwithstanding one authority to the contrary.\(^\text{20}\) This issue may be the subject of further judicial consideration.

Real risk

The threshold for the ‘real risk’ element in the complementary protection criterion in s 36(2)(aa) is the same as that for the ‘real chance’ test in the refugee criterion in s 36(2)(a).\(^\text{21}\) A ‘real chance’ in the context of refugee assessment has been described by the High Court as a substantial chance, as distinct from a remote or far-fetched possibility; however, it may be well below a 50 per cent chance.\(^\text{22}\) The principles relevant to the ‘real chance’ test are discussed in detail in Chapter 3 – Well-founded fear, and apply equally in the complementary protection context. This includes the principles that the experience of the past may assist in an assessment of the likely risk of future harm,\(^\text{23}\) and that if a decision-maker is unable to make a finding with sufficient confidence, they may need to consider the possibility that the finding is incorrect (‘what if I am wrong?’).\(^\text{24}\) However, unlike the refugee criterion, s 36(2)(aa) does not require that an applicant hold a subjective fear.\(^\text{25}\)

---

19. In WZASD v MIBP [2013] FCCA 1940 at [30] the Court focused on the requirement for a real risk that an applicant ‘will suffer’ significant harm to reject that certain past events (and the fear arising from them) gave rise to a real risk of significant harm that should have been considered by the reviewer. Again in SZTQP v MIBP [2015] FCCA 423 at [16], the Court observed that, like that under the Refugees Convention, s 36(2)(aa) imposes a forward-looking test of reasonable foreseeability (although overturned on appeal, this aspect was not the subject of consideration: SZTQP v MIBP (2015) 232 FCR 452). The Complementary Protection Guidelines also interpret the test as a forward-looking one, stating that a real risk of significant harm will not arise from harm which has already taken place and has no prospect of recurring. They cite the example of harm such as forced sterilisation, which by its nature can only occur once: Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.5.4, as re-issued 29 February 2020.

20. In CKX16 v MIBP (No 2) [2018] FCCA 2894 the Federal Circuit Court found that s 36(2)(aa) could be satisfied if a person suffers the consequences of the relevant act in the future (in this instance, mental suffering), even if the act itself occurred in the past (in this instance, witnessing a murder): at [32]–[33]. Upon remittal from this judgment, the Tribunal again affirmed the decision to refuse the applicant a protection visa. In doing so, it concluded that to engage s 36(2)(aa) an applicant must satisfy the Tribunal that there is a real risk he or she will suffer significant harm in the receiving country and that is more than an act or omission or place in the received country, which cannot be lawfully engaged by an act in the past or the future consequence of an act in the past: 1832684 (Refugee) [2019] AATA 3744. Following a further judicial review application, the Federal Circuit Court in BVT20 v MICMSMA [2020] FCCA 1075 agreed with the Tribunal’s approach at [37]–[42], but did not expressly disagree with CKX16 or find that it was wrong (see [32]). It is therefore likely that this issue will be the subject of further judicial consideration. However, given that the approach in CKX16 does not appear to be consistent with the plain wording of s 36(2)(aa), it is recommended that the plain wording of CKX16 be treated with caution.

21. MIA v SZORB [2013] 210 FCR 505 (special leave to appeal from this judgment was refused: MIA v SZORB [2013] HCATrans 323). The Court rejected the submission that ‘real risk’ was a higher threshold which required that the possibility of harm be more likely than not; per Lander and Gordon JJ at [246], Besanko and Jagot JJ at [297], Flick J at [342]; reflected in the Complementary Protection Guidelines: see Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.5.1, as re-issued 29 February 2020. The Court in SZORB was considering an international treaties obligation assessment conducted by an officer of the Department which had applied a test of ‘more likely than not’ when assessing ‘real risk’. Although that assessment did not directly apply s 36(2)(aa), the issue before the Court centred on the interpretation of ‘real risk’ for the purpose of the obligations codified in that provision. See also MYKXS v MIA [2013] FMCA 13 (upheld on appeal in MYKXS v MIA [2013] FCA 614) at [19] where the Court stated that the ‘real risk’ and ‘real chance’ ‘tests appeared substantially the same.

23. See MZAAD v MIBP [2015] FCA 1031 at [41], referring to MIEA v Guo (1997) 191 CLR 559 at 574 and 575. The Court went on to say, however, that it would be inappropriate to make the evaluator process in assessing ‘real risk’ to consideration of past events or a quantitative or statistical analysis: at [43].

24. See Chapter 3 – Well-founded fear under ‘What if I am wrong?’ and the cases referred to therein: MIEA v Wu Shan Liang (1996) 185 CLR 259; MIEA v Guo (1997) 191 CLR 559; Abebe v The Commonwealth (1999) 197 CLR 510; MIMA v Rajalingam (1999) 93 FCR 220. The application of this test in the complementary protection context was accepted by the
Depending upon the claims made, a decision-maker may be able to rely on a finding as to whether there is a real chance of harm to an applicant for the purpose of the refugee criterion when assessing the real risk of significant harm under s 36(2)(aa).26 However, while the judgment of the Full Federal Court in MIAC v SZORB has clarified the interpretation of ‘real risk’ in s 36(2)(aa), because the construction of that provision was not directly in issue, the judgment does not provide authority on its other elements, including the significance of the expressions ‘substantial grounds for believing’ and ‘necessary and foreseeable consequence’. As the Federal Court has observed, the phrase ‘real risk’ should be read in context: the ‘substantial grounds for believing’ and ‘will suffer’ parts of the provision are not unimportant but, contextually, emphasise and reinforce the need to establish the substantive nature of the risk.27

Where a decision-maker finds that there is a real risk of harm based on their refugee criterion findings, they will need to go on to consider the other elements of s 36(2)(aa).28 These are discussed below.

Substantial grounds for believing

The requirement in s 36(2)(aa) that there be both ‘substantial grounds’ and ‘a real risk’ suggests that ‘substantial grounds’ imposes an evidentiary standard, and ‘real risk’ an assessment of the probability of the applicant suffering significant harm. The Full Federal Court has stated that an applicant’s credibility will be plainly relevant to the question of substantial grounds for believing there is a real risk.29 The Complementary Protection Guidelines also view the ‘substantial grounds’ requirement in s 36(2)(aa) as directed to the evidentiary standard to be met.30

---

26 In MZYXS v MIAC [2013] FCA 614 at [31] the Court held that the Tribunal had been entitled to rely on its finding that there was no real chance of the relevant harm alleged for Refugee Convention purposes in assessing whether there was a real risk of significant harm for complementary protection purposes, in circumstances when the same essential claims and facts were being relied on in each aspect of the applicant’s case before the Tribunal. See generally the discussion under “Addressing claims under section 36(2)(aa)” above.
27 MZAAD v MBP [2015] FCA 1031 at [34].
28 In SZTW v MBP [2014] FCCA 1347 the Court observed that the requirements concerning ‘substantial grounds’ and ‘necessary and foreseeable consequence’ are in addition to the ‘real risk’ requirement, and the complementary protection obligations and criteria differ in this regard from those derived from the Refugees Convention: at [41]–[42]. See also SZSKC v MBP [2014] FCCA 938 at [72]–[73]. Contrast SZTAL v MBP [2015] FCCA 64 at [21] where the Court appears to have taken a different view, saying that it was ‘settled that the expressions “real risk” and “as a necessary and foreseeable consequence [of removal]” in s 36(2)(aa) together require nothing more nor less than the application of the same “real chance” test that is applied in respect of the refugee criterion’, citing SZORB as authority for this proposition (undisturbed on appeal in SZTAL v MBP [2016] 243 FCR 556 and in SZTAL v MBP: SZTM v MBP (2017) 262 CLR 382.
29 SZSHK v MBP [2013] FCACF 125 at [31]. In contrast, the Federal Court in MIAC v Anochie (2012) 209 FCR 497 at [67] opined that ‘the superaddition of the words “substantial grounds for believing”’ [in UN Human Rights Committee General Comment 31 and subsequent jurisprudence of the Committee] do not add any additional requirements to the test’. However, the Court in that case was considering the non-refoulement obligation arising under the ICCPR by reference to jurisprudence of the Committee rather than the terms of a statutory provision such as s 36(2)(aa). On accepted principles of statutory construction, it would appear unlikely that a Court would infer that Parliament did not intend the ‘substantial grounds’ limb to have any operation (see Chapter 1 – Protection visas for further discussion of interpretive principles).
30 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.5.5, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
A necessary and foreseeable consequence

The criterion in s 36(2)(aa) also requires that the risk of harm be a ‘necessary and foreseeable consequence’ of the applicant being removed from Australia to the receiving country.

In SZSKC v MIBP, the Court confirmed that the ‘necessary and foreseeable consequence’ element in s 36(2)(aa) attaches to the risk of harm, rather than the actual occurrence of harm, i.e. exposure to the risk (and not the harm itself) must be a necessary and foreseeable consequence of return.\textsuperscript{31} The test is not applied by putting the applicant in a position where he or she must prove that he or she is in direct way of real harm before the real risk test is applied; nor is there a requirement on the applicant to prove that he or she will suffer harm, because that places the onus of proof in s 36(2)(aa) far too high.\textsuperscript{32} A similar approach was taken in MIAC v Anochie to the interpretation of this phrase in considering Australia’s non-refoulement obligation under the ICCPR.\textsuperscript{33}

This element is in addition to the real risk test, so even where it is accepted that there is a risk of significant harm, the requirements of s 36(2)(aa) will not be satisfied until it is established that a necessary and foreseeable consequence of return is exposure to that risk.\textsuperscript{34} The Complementary Protection Guidelines also treat this element of the test as an additional requirement, stating that it requires decision-makers to be satisfied that there is a real, as opposed to speculative, causal and temporal link between removal from Australia and the likelihood or possibility of their facing a real risk of significant harm.\textsuperscript{35} On a plain reading of the words in s 36(2)(aa) it appears that ‘necessary and foreseeable consequence’ imposes a causal and temporal requirement — there must be some link between the removal of the applicant from Australia to the receiving country, and the real risk of significant harm.\textsuperscript{36}

Sur place claims

As with the refugee criterion, the assessment of the complementary protection criterion is not restricted to events occurring in the applicant’s country of reference before their arrival in Australia. A risk of harm may arise as a result of actions or events which have occurred while an applicant is in Australia or elsewhere outside the receiving country. This may be \textsuperscript{31} SZSKC v MIBP [2014] FCCA 938 at [71]–[73]. The Court found that the test is not whether the harm (‘imprisonment’) is a necessary or foreseeable consequence (i.e. ‘inevitable’), but whether there is a real risk, as a necessary and foreseeable consequence of return, that the harm will be suffered: at [84].

\textsuperscript{32} SZSKC v MIBP [2014] FCCA 938 at [84]–[85].
\textsuperscript{33} MIAC v Anochie (2012) 209 FCR 497, where the court interpreted jurisprudence of the Human Rights Committee as saying that under the non-refoulement obligation in the ICCPR, it is the risk of harm which must be a necessary and foreseeable consequence of return, rather than the harm itself being a necessary and foreseeable consequence: at [66]. The Court also emphasised the high standard set by composite limbs of the phrase ‘necessary and foreseeable consequence’: at [62]. However, this case was interpreting Australia’s non-refoulement obligations under the ICCPR (in relation to the review of a decision to cancel a visa under s 951 of the Migration Act), which differs from the interpretation of a provision of a domestic statute such as s 36(2)(aa): at [21] and [37].
\textsuperscript{34} SZSKC v MIBP [2014] FCCA 938 at [72]–[73]. This is in contrast to the suggestion in the Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 that this element was intended to inform the determination of ‘real risk’ rather than impose an additional requirement, stating that ‘a real risk of significant harm is one where the harm is a necessary and foreseeable consequence of removal’: at [67]. Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.5.6, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
\textsuperscript{35} However, as discussed below under ‘Perpetrator of the harm’, it does not appear intended that the harm could directly arise from the act of removal itself.
due to changing circumstances in the receiving country, or the applicant’s own actions, or those of a third party. Unlike the criterion in s 36(2)(a), which is subject to s 5J(6) or s 91R(3) depending upon when the visa application was made, there is no ‘bad faith’ exception for the complementary protection criterion. Tha

Modified conduct to avoid threat of harm

There is a real question as to whether the principle discussed in the Refugees Convention context in Appellant S395/2002 v MIMA, that a person should not be expected to modify certain kinds of conduct to avoid persecutory harm, extends to the assessment of complementary protection. Courts have approached this issue differently at first instance, and none of those approaches have been clearly approved on appeal.

n BBS16 v MIBP, the Federal Circuit Court was of the view that a finding that the applicant would not publicly agitate in support of political, economic and cultural rights upon return was not a complete answer to the claim for complementary protection. The Court held that the decision-maker erred in failing to consider whether there was a relevant denial of rights under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), and whether the applicant’s non-exercise of those rights was a consequence of the denial and the risk of harm resulting from an attempted exercise of them. Although not expressly stated, the primary judge appeared to apply principles from S395 regarding the need to consider the reason(s) why a person would modify their behaviour upon return.

---

37 SZRQR v MIAC [2013] FMCA 21 at [13]. This is because s 91R(3) is expressed to refer directly to the Refugees Convention. See also SZRSA v MIAC [2012] FMCA 1187 at [38], SZSJC v MIBP [2013] FCCA 1755 at [89], SZSNY v MIAC [2013] FCCA 1465 at [24], and SZRL6 v MIBP [2014] FCCA 2851 at [47], [56] and [61]. For further discussion of the bad faith exception under s 91R(3)/s 5J(6) see Chapter 3 – Well-founded fear.

38 See, for example, SZTDM v MIBP (No 2) [2013] FCCA 2060 at [70], SZSJC v MIBP [2013] FCCA 1755 at [89] and SZSNY v MIAC [2013] FCCA 1465 at [24]. In SZTDM the Federal Circuit Court found that the applicant’s evidence focusing on his conduct in Australia gave rise to the claim that that conduct created or magnified a risk of being subject to significant harm (at [70]). Similarly, in SZSJC at [24] the Court found error on the basis of the Tribunal’s failure to consider whether any risk of significant harm to the applicant arose from his conduct in Australia, saying that that claim arose clearly from the materials. However, in SZSJC the court held that conduct disregarded for the purpose of s 36(2)(a) did not need to be explicitly considered under s 36(2)(aa) where the applicant had not claimed to fear significant harm as a result of those activities.

39 Appellant S395/2002 v MIMA (2003) 216 CLR 473. For discussion of the principles in S395 see Chapter 11 – Application of the Refugees Convention in particular situations. This principle is also partly codified in s 5J(3) of the Act, applicable to the refugee criterion for post 16 December 2014 protection visa applications. However, as s 5J(3) relates specifically to ‘well-founded fear of persecution’ it is not applicable to assessment of s 36(2)(aa).

40 BBS16 v MIBP [2017] FCCA 4 at [75]. This followed the Federal Circuit Court judgment in SZSWB v MIBP [2014] FCCA 765, where the Court held that there is no reason why the principle in S395 should not apply to the Conventions which support the complementary protection provisions of the Act in the same way as it applies in the Refugees Convention context: at [65] and [68]. This reasoning was subsequently adopted in MZAIv v MIBP [2015] FCCA 2782 at [24]. However, both of these judgments were overturned on appeal for different reasons without clarifying this issue: MIBP v SZSWB [2014] FCAFC 106 at [42]–[43] (application for special leave refused: SZSWB v MIBP [2015] HCATrans 17) and MIBP v MZAIv [2016] FCA 251 at [41] (application for special leave refused: MZAIv v MIBP [2016] HCASL 193).

41 Appellant S395/2002 v MIMA (2003) 216 CLR 473 at [43], [53] and [88].
On appeal, the Full Federal Court in MBP v BBS16 held that the primary judge erred in the emphasis that he gave to the ICCPR, and that this was inconsistent with several binding authorities which made it clear that the ICCPR has not been incorporated into domestic law in its entirety. The Full Court held that the decision-maker did not need to consider whether the denial of the applicant’s political, economic and cultural rights involved a relevant breach of the ICCPR. The Minister’s submissions highlighted that unlike s 36(2)(a), the complementary protection provision in s 36(2)(aa) does not operate by reference to the traits or characteristics of a particular person, and further, the real risk must arise as a necessary and foreseeable consequence of the applicant’s removal from Australia, not from a person’s own conduct and choice. While the Full Court did not expressly address these submissions, or whether the principles from S395 have any relevance to a complementary protection assessment, each of the authorities it referred to emphasised the importance of the terms of the legislation, particularly s 36(2)(aa), in considering a claim for complementary protection.

In contrast, in BPX17 v MBP, the Federal Circuit Court rejected a submission that S395 has direct application to suppression of an attribute (in this case religious practice) in the complementary protection context, referring to the fact that significant harm is defined in s 36(2A). On appeal, the Minister again made detailed submissions on this point, but the Federal Court found that the question of whether S395 applied to complementary protection did not need to be determined on the facts.

More recently, in ADL17 v MICMSMA an applicant argued that the decision-maker failed to apply S395 principles to its consideration of the complementary protection criteria by not considering why the applicant had previously conducted his music and dance activities underground and with discretion. The Federal Circuit Court held that S395 principles should be confined to the determination of refugee status under s 36(2)(a) and should not be extended to the quite different considerations raised in relation to complementary protection under s 36(2)(aa).

The Department’s Complementary Protection Guidelines indicate that the Minister’s position is that the reasoning in S395 is not relevant to the assessment of complementary protection, reasoning that harm resulting from an applicant’s choices upon return would not (inevitably) satisfy the necessary causal nexus (i.e. that the real risk of significant harm is a necessary and foreseeable consequence of the applicant’s removal).

---

42 MBP v BBS16 [2017] FCAFC 176 at [45] and[50].
43 MBP v BBS16 [2017] FCAFC 176 at [45]. Nonetheless the Court went on to find that the decision-maker erred by failing to apply the principle from S395 in the context of the refugee criterion in s 36(2)(a); at [82]–[84].
44 MBP v BBS16 [2017] FCAFC 176 at [23].
46 BPX17 v MBP [2017] FCCA 3047 at [25]–[29]. The judgment ultimately turned on the Court’s finding that the applicant had not made a claim that she wished to proselytise throughout India such that she would be suppressing her religious practice.
47 BPX17 v MBP [2018] FCA 763 at [116]. The Minister’s submissions are set out at [63]–[66].
48 ADL17 v MICMSMA [2020] FCA 148 at [98]–[105]. The Court’s reasoning included that the complementary protection criterion was not amended at the time that s 5J(3) was inserted into the Act to include a provision concerning behaviour modification, the ‘large step’ involved in reading text into the complementary protection provisions, and the pacity of the applicant’s submissions to the Court. In the absence of any detailed submissions, the Court preferred a view that was consistent with the observations in MBP v SZSCA (2014) 254 CLR 317 of Gageler J at [37] that S395 should not be extended beyond its rationale.
49 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.5.6.1, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
In light of the clear (albeit first instance) authority in ADL17, and the emphasis on the legislative text in judgments such as MIBP v BBS16, it is difficult to see how an applicant’s self-suppression or modification of behaviour to avoid harm upon return can be imported into an assessment under s. 36(2)(aa). However, it is likely that this question will be the subject of further judicial development.

Significant harm

The real risk contemplated by s 36(2)(aa) is ‘...a real risk that the non-citizen will suffer significant harm’. This is different from the concept of serious harm as required by ss 5J(4)(b)/91R(1)(b) (as applicable) in the context of s 36(2)(a). The types of harm that will amount to ‘significant harm’ are exhaustively defined by s 36(2A). Under this provision, a person will suffer significant harm if he or she will be arbitrarily deprived of his or her life; or the death penalty will be carried out on the person; or the person will be subjected to torture; or to cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment; or to degrading treatment or punishment.

‘Cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’, ‘degrading treatment or punishment’, and ‘torture’, are further defined in s 5(1) of the Act. The definitions of both ‘torture’ and ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ refer to ‘severe pain and suffering’, although ‘pain or suffering’ can meet the definition of ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ in some circumstances. By contrast, ‘degrading treatment or punishment’ is concerned with humiliation rather than pain and suffering as such.

The definitions of ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’, ‘degrading treatment or punishment’, and ‘torture’ refer to ‘an act or omission’. This means that only an action or a failure to act would fall within the definition, which may be distinguished from a consequence of an act or an omission.

The requirement for ‘an act or omission’ is linked to the fact that torture, cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment and degrading treatment or punishment all require an element of intention. The definition of torture also requires that the harm be inflicted for a particular purpose. There are exceptions in each of these definitions for harm that arises pursuant to lawful sanctions not inconsistent with the Articles of the ICCPR, and in the case of cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment, there is also an exception for harm that is not inconsistent with art 7 of the ICCPR.

Although each form of harm has a discrete identity, there may be some overlap between the different types of significant harm such that some forms of ill-treatment may fall within more than one of these definitions.\textsuperscript{53} It may not be necessary for a decision-maker to address each form of harm individually.\textsuperscript{54} Nor would every form of harm claimed need to be assessed against the definitions, where the harm could not meet any of the definitions.\textsuperscript{55} Whether a particular harm falls within the definitions is largely a question of fact.\textsuperscript{56}

While some of the definitions incorporate a notion of physical harm, it is apparent that other kinds of harm such as mental suffering are also contemplated by some of the definitions. A threat could amount to significant harm in circumstances where it meets one of the statutory definitions.\textsuperscript{57}

Each type of significant harm is considered in turn below, followed by consideration of the common element of ‘lawful sanctions’ and of who can perpetrate significant harm.

Arbitrary deprivation of life

Under ss 36(2A)(a), a person will suffer significant harm if that person will be arbitrarily deprived of his or her life. This harm is not further defined by the Act but the words ‘arbitrarily deprived’ are to be given their ordinary meaning.\textsuperscript{58} While there is no restriction as to who must inflict the harm (apart from it needing to be a party other than the applicant)\textsuperscript{59} or why, judicial comments in Australia have suggested that this kind of harm concerns such things as extrajudicial killing and the excessive use of police force, and does not concern the consequences of scarce medical resources in developing countries.\textsuperscript{60}

---

\textsuperscript{53} In other jurisdictions, the terms are not separated. Thus, the approach in considering claims based on instruments which contain similar protections has been to find that particular ill-treatment amounts to one of these types of harm, rather than identifying precisely which: Jane McAdam, ‘Australian Complementary Protection: A Step-By-Step Approach’ (2011) 33 Sydney Law Review 687 (‘Australian Complementary Protection’) at 702. However, consideration under ss 36(2)(aa) will require a decision-maker to be satisfied that the harm meets at least one of the harms in s 36(2A), with regard to the further definitions in s 5(1). The Complementary Protection Guidelines require that where an applicant claims they will suffer torture, decision-makers should assess the claimed harm against that definition before assessing whether it meets the definition of one of the other types of harm, as under the CAT, certain consequences flow from a finding of torture: Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.4, as reissued 29 February 2020.

\textsuperscript{54} In SZSYP v MIBP [2014] FCCA 7, the Court accepted that the Tribunal was aware of the definitions of the different forms of significant harm, and accepted the Tribunal’s ‘rolled up’ conclusion that the likely period of time that the applicant would be held in prison and the known conditions of that detention were not such as to satisfy the test for significant harm: at [44]. The Court was somewhat critical of the reasoning, however, noting that the reasons ‘could have been more fulsomely expressed’: at [47]. In SZTBW v MIBP [2014] FCCA 1809, the Court followed the approach in SZSYP v MIBP, observing that a qualitative assessment of the accepted harm was a question of fact, and it was a finding of fact and degree for the decision-maker whether, for a brief period on remand in prison in the conditions as found, such experience fell within the forms of harm in the definition of ‘significant harm’: at [39]–[40], [55]–[58] (appeal dismissed although this aspect of the reasoning was not considered: SZTBW v MIBP [2014] FCCA 1277).

\textsuperscript{55} SZSRY v MIBP [2014] FCCA 2447. In that case, the Court held that there was no error in the Reviewer failing to specifically address whether the applicant’s inability to obtain a government job was significant harm, because such discrimination could not reasonably be interpreted as constituting significant harm as defined: at [49].

\textsuperscript{57} In MZZES v MIBP [2014] FCCA 758 the Court observed in obiter that there are circumstances where a threat of itself could constitute significant harm – there must be an immediacy in the threat (for it to cause mental anguish that might amount to significant harm) and no other factor in the victim’s knowledge that would mitigate against the likelihood of the threat being carried out: at [26], [29]. Although the judgment was overturned on appeal, this aspect of the reasoning was upheld: MZZES v MIBP [2015] FCA 397 at [44].

\textsuperscript{58} MZAAJ v MIBP [2015] FCA 478 at [6].

\textsuperscript{59} See EZC18 v MHA [2019] FCA 2143 at [44]–[45] and [47].

\textsuperscript{60} MZAAJ v MIBP [2015] FCCA 151 in obiter dicta comments at [42]. In this case, the applicant claimed the Tribunal failed to consider that he might face arbitrary deprivation of life because of the prospect that he might die as a result of his inability to access dialysis in Sri Lanka. The Court held that the Tribunal, which had considered the claim against the definitions of cruel/unhuman/degrading treatment or punishment, had implicitly found that this did not fall within the concept of arbitrary deprivation of life, and was correct in so concluding: at [40]–[41] (upheld on appeal: MZAAJ v MIBP [2015] FCA 478; special leave application dismissed: MZAAJ v MIBP [2015] HCA Trans 238. See also SZDCD v MIBP [2019] FCA 326.
This type of significant harm does not require an actual subjective intention to arbitrarily deprive a person of their life. However, the need for an intentional or deliberate act or omission that results in another person being deprived of their life has been read into the definition. In EZC18 v MHA the Federal Court upheld the Tribunal’s finding that the risk of suicide upon return to the UK did not amount to a real risk of the appellant being arbitrarily deprived of his life. At first instance, having regard to the dictionary definitions of ‘arbitrary’ and ‘deprive’, the ICCPR, the second reading speech for the bill that introduced the complementary protection provisions and the intentionality requirement in the other types of significant harm under s 36(2A), the Federal Circuit Court held that a decision-maker must be satisfied that another actor is intent on dispossessing another person of their life in a despotic or tyrannical fashion or otherwise subject to whim or caprice. On appeal, the Federal Court undertook a similar analysis to the Federal Circuit Court and ultimately held that s 36(2A)(a) is restricted to the risk of being deprived of life by a third party or parties. Aside from commenting in obiter that ‘it is not necessary for the actions to be despotic or tyrannical’, the Federal Court appears to have otherwise implicitly endorsed the reasoning of the Federal Circuit Court.

Only conduct which is arbitrary in nature will meet the definition of arbitrary deprivation of life. In SZDCD v MIBP the Tribunal found that the appellant would not be arbitrarily deprived of his life based on his claim that he suffered from a life threatening medical condition and would not receive the care he needed if he was returned to Bangladesh. In upholding the Tribunal’s decision, the Federal Court held that although the appellant may lose his life as a result of losing access to medical treatment available in Australia, the Australian government’s removal of the appellant will not arbitrarily deprive him of his life. The act would be deliberate, would presumably be effected lawfully and had no quality of randomness. Further, it would not deprive him of his life, rather it would deprive him of his present access to medical treatment.

Having regard to the dictionary definitions of ‘arbitrary’ and ‘deprive’, and the fact that ss 36(2A)(b) to (e) are directed to ‘serious forms of human rights abuses’, the Court held - similarly to the Federal Circuit Court judgment in EZC18 - that a non-citizen may be ‘arbitrarily deprived of his or her life’ by lawful or unlawful action that is demonstrated to have elements of capriciousness, inappropriateness, injustice or lack of predictability. It held that

---

61 See SZDCD v MIBP [2019] FCA 326 at [49]. See also GCL v V MicMSMA [2020] FCCA 270 at [31]. In GCL v V MicMSMA the Federal Circuit Court held that the Tribunal erroneously proceeded on the basis that s 36(2A)(a) required an intention to inflict harm. However, the Court did not consider the judgment in EZC18 v MHA [2019] FCA 464, implicitly endorsed in EZC18 v MHA [2019] FCA 2142 (see below), which held that arbitrary deprivation of life must arise from an intentional act or omission from a third party. The Court did not appear to draw a distinction between an actual subjective intention to deprive someone of their life, and intentional or deliberate conduct that results in another person being deprived of their life, as has been accepted as necessary in EZC18 and other cases concerning medical treatment and mental health claims. For this reason, the judgment should be treated with caution.

62 EZC18 v MHA [2019] FCA 2143, upholding the judgment at first instance in EZC18 v MHA [2019] FCCA 464. The Federal Court held that, in the alternative, there was nothing arbitrary about the removal of the appellant from Australia and the receiving of him by the UK, there being nothing to suggest that the appellant’s removal under s 186 of the Act would be other than lawful: at [47].

63 EZC18 v MHA [2019] FCCA 464 at [74]. However, the Department’s Complementary Protection Guidelines state that although intention can be a relevant indicator of arbitrary deprivation of life, it is not a necessary element: Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.1.1, as re-issued 29 February 2020. This is despite the fact that the Guidelines were re-issued after both the EZC18 judgments at first instance and on appeal were delivered.

64 EZC18 v MHA [2019] FCA 2143 at [47].

65 EZC18 v MHA [2019] FCA 2143 at [45].

66 See SZDCD v MIBP [2019] FCA 326 at [49].
the words ‘arbitrarily deprived’ imply conduct which is responsible for the deprivation of a person’s life, and that the requirement of arbitrariness operates to characterise the conduct by which a person is deprived of their life.

The Complementary Protection Guidelines refer to arbitrary deprivation of life as also involving elements of injustice, lack of predictability, or lack of proportionality and say that the concept of arbitrariness is broader than unlawfulness. The Guidelines provide various examples of circumstances in which potential harm may or may not be characterised as ‘arbitrary deprivation of life’, but emphasise that there must be a real and personal risk to the individual, saying that where the threat is from non-state actors, decision-makers should be satisfied that there are ‘extremely widespread conditions of violence, coupled with a particular risk to the individual in question’ before reaching a conclusion that there is a real risk that an applicant will be arbitrarily deprived of his or her life.

Section 36(2A)(a) derives from arts 2 and 6 of the ICCPR. Article 6 states that every human being has the inherent right to life and that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of their life. However, it should be noted that art 6 of the ICCPR includes an express protection of the right to life, whereas significant harm within the meaning of s 36(2A)(a) is directed only at the arbitrary deprivation of life. As such, case law from other jurisdictions considering a positive right to life (such as the provision of medical treatment or measures to increase life expectancy or reduce mortality) is unlikely to be directly applicable to the interpretation of s 36(2A)(a), particularly in light of the judgment in SZDCD (discussed above).

The death penalty will be carried out

The second type of significant harm identified in s 36(2A) is that ‘the death penalty will be carried out on the non-citizen’: s 36(2A)(b). As with arbitrary deprivation of life this type of harm is not further defined or explained in the Act. The obligation not to refoul a person at risk of having the death penalty carried out on them derives from arts 2 and 6 of the ICCPR and from the Second Optional Protocol. Unlike some other types of significant harm, there is no ‘lawful sanctions’ exception applicable to s 36(2A)(b). The death penalty, where it will be carried out, will amount to significant harm regardless of the nature or seriousness of the crime of which the applicant is accused (although in such cases, the exclusion criteria in s 36(2C) may be in issue).

It will not be sufficient that a person has committed a crime punishable by the death penalty, or even that they have had the death penalty imposed as a sentence – when considered with s 36(2)(aa), s 36(2A)(b) requires that there be a real risk that the death sentence will be carried out.
carried out. In MZYXS v MIAC the Federal Magistrates Court stated that it appears that the wording of s 36(2A)(b) was intended to avoid the consequence that the imposition of the death penalty (even if it would not be carried out) would be considered to be ‘significant harm’. This is also made clear in the Explanatory Memorandum which lists examples of circumstances where a death penalty may be imposed but not actually carried out as including where actual executions are rare in the particular country, where a sentence is likely to be commuted, or where Australia obtains a reliable undertaking that the death penalty will not be carried out. Similarly, if a person has committed a crime punishable by death, but there is no real risk that they will ever be prosecuted or that the death penalty will be imposed as a sentence, then there may not be a real risk of significant harm within the meaning of s 36(2A)(b). Ultimately, whether there is a real risk that the death penalty will be carried out is a question of fact for the decision-maker. Any reason or justification for imposition of the death penalty (such as the nature of the crime) is not necessarily relevant to that question.

Torture

The third type of significant harm identified in s 36(2A) is that the non-citizen ‘will be subjected to torture’: s 36(2A)(c). ‘Torture’ is exhaustively defined in s 5(1) of the Act as:

> an act or omission by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person:
>
> (a) for the purpose of obtaining from the person or from a third person information or a confession; or
>
> (b) for the purpose of punishing the person for an act which that person or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed; or
>
> (c) for the purpose of intimidating or coercing the person or a third person; or
>
> (d) for a purpose related to a purpose mentioned in paragraph (a), (b) or (c); or
>
> (e) for any reason based on discrimination that is inconsistent with the Articles of the [ICCPR].

This definition contains a number of different elements which must be satisfied in order for the harm to be characterised as ‘torture’. The harm must be caused by an act or omission, involve ‘severe pain or suffering’, which can be either physical or mental, and there are also intention and purpose requirements. Although the ill-treatment must be inflicted for a specified purpose, it is not dependent upon being inflicted on a discriminatory ground. In addition, torture ‘does not include an act or omission arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions that are not inconsistent with the Articles of the [ICCPR].”

73 MZYXS v MIAC [2013] FMCA 13 at [31], upheld on appeal in MZYXS v MIAC [2013] FCA 614. The Court rejected an argument that this different wording meant that, where a law of a country would result in a type of harm in s 36(2A) other than the death penalty, then whether or not that law would be carried out is irrelevant, saying that was an improper reading of s 36(2A) at [30].

74 Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 (Cth) at [77]–[79]. See also the examples of where a death penalty may be imposed but not carried out in McAdam, ‘Australian Complementary Protection’, above n 53 at 696.

75 Although the nature of the crime may be relevant to exclusion under s 36(2C), discussed below.

76 There is a different definition of torture in the Criminal Code Act 1995 (Cth) which does not require the harm to be intentionally inflicted, but that is in a different context and does not affect the meaning of torture in s 5(1); see SZTAL v MIBP; SZTGM v MIBP (2017) 262 CLR 362 at [20]–[25] and [89]–[91] and SZTAL v MIBP (2016) 243 FCR 556 at [67]. For further discussion, see McAdam, ‘Australian Complementary Protection’, above n 53 at 697.

77 See also Nagaratnam v MIMA (1999) 84 FCR 569 at [32], considering the similarly worded art 3(1) of CAT.
incidental to, lawful sanctions that are not inconsistent with the Articles of the Covenant.’ Each of these elements of the definition is discussed further below.

The definition of torture in the Act is said to derive from the non-refoulement obligations in art 3 of CAT and arts 2 and 7 of the ICCPR. However, there are material differences between the Australian and international definitions. For example, in contrast to the definition of ‘torture’ in art 1 of CAT, there is no requirement in s 36(2A)(c) or in the definition in s 5(1) that the harm be committed by a person who is a public official or acting in an official capacity. As such, caution should be exercised when relying upon any international jurisprudence in this area when considering the definition of ‘torture’ in s 5(1).

An act or omission

Although the definition of torture refers to ‘an act or omission’, this should not be taken to exclude multiple acts or omissions. Section 23(b) of the Acts Interpretation Act 1901 (Cth) provides that words in the singular number include the plural and words in the plural number include the singular. As such, it appears that a number of acts or omissions intentionally inflicted for one or more of the purposes could cumulatively amount to torture within the meaning of the s 5(1) definition where, when taken together, the pain or suffering rises to the level of ‘severe’.

Severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental

To amount to torture, an act or omission must cause ‘severe pain or suffering’, which can be either physical or mental. Whether pain or suffering is ‘severe’ will be a question for the decision-maker in each case. The requirement of the severity is linked to the pain or suffering, rather than the nature of the act or omission which causes it. Consistently with this, the Complementary Protection Guidelines refer to consideration of factors such as the nature and context of the treatment, its duration, its effects, and in some instances the personal characteristics of the victim, when determining whether physical or mental pain or suffering meets the severity threshold in the definition of ‘torture’. The Guidelines also contain examples of treatment that may or may not amount to torture.
Intentionally inflicted

The definition of torture requires an element of intent. It is ‘an act or omission by which severe pain or suffering … is intentionally inflicted on a person’ for a specified purpose or reason. There are similar requirements of intention in the definitions of ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ and ‘degrading treatment or punishment’.

Intent, in this context, requires an actual, subjective, intention on the part of a person to bring about the suffering by their conduct.\(^{82}\) In Sztal v Mibp, a majority of the High Court rejected the contention that knowledge or foresight of a result establishes the necessary intention element of the definitions of torture, cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment and degrading treatment or punishment.\(^{83}\) While evidence of foresight of the risk of pain, suffering or humiliation may support an inference of intention (and in some cases may render the inference compelling), foresight of a result is of evidential significance only.\(^{84}\)

Mere negligence, without more, will also not establish the necessary intention element of any of the relevant definitions in s 5.\(^{85}\) Establishing the necessary intention also likely requires identification of the individual(s) who will carry out the act or omission.\(^{86}\)

Purpose

To amount to torture under ss 36(2A)(c) and 5(1) of the Act, an act or omission by which severe pain or suffering is intentionally inflicted on a person must be inflicted for one of the five specified purposes. These purposes are exhaustive and an act or omission intended to inflict severe pain or suffering for a different purpose will not amount to torture (although it may potentially amount to another type of significant harm). Both the Act and the Explanatory Memorandum are silent as to whether the purpose must be the sole purpose for the infliction of severe pain or suffering.

---

82 Sztal v Mibp; Sztgmv Mibp (2017) 262 CLR 362 at [26]–[27] and [114]. This upheld the Full Federal Court judgment in Sztal v Mibp (2016) 243 FCR 556.
83 Sztal v Mibp; Sztgmv Mibp (2017) 262 CLR 362. Their Honours found no error in the Tribunal's conclusion that while the applicants would likely be remanded in a prison for a short period, the evidence did not support that any pain or suffering as a consequence would be by an intentionally inflicted act or omission, as the poor prison conditions were due to a lack of resources rather than any intention by the Sri Lankan government to inflict such harm.
84 Sztal v Mibp; Sztgmv Mibp (2017) 262 CLR 362 at [27], [29] and [99]–[100].
85 See Szspe v Mibp (2013) FCCA 1989 at [68] and [72] (upheld on appeal Sztal v Mibp [2014] FCCA 64 and a number of subsequent cases suggests that the question of intention requires identification of the relevant individual(s) who will carry out the act or omission. For example, in Szwdk v Mibp [2015] FCCA 2164 at [17] the Court, following Sztal at first instance, rejected an argument that the Tribunal ought to have considered whether placing the applicant in an overcrowded jail would be intentionally inflicted given the authorities would know of the prison conditions. In the Court's view, the applicant's argument overlooked the question of whose intention was in issue (upheld on appeal SZWDK v MIBP [2016] FCA 979). In AGH15 v MIBP (2015) FCA 1797 the Court considered an argument that the intention to cause extreme humiliation could arise from the law itself (which in that case imposed penalties for illegal departure). The Court observed, in obiter, that what was required was a subjective intention, and in circumstances where the harm was said to arise by operation of law, it was unclear whose intention would be relevant (for example, whether it would be the entire Parliament, or a majority of the Parliament). The Court also considered the nature of the penalties (a fine and possible brief period of detention) to point against any intention to cause extreme humiliation: at [50], [56]. This judgment was upheld on appeal in AGH15 v MIBP [2015] FCA 1181, where the Court found it unnecessary to determine, but expressed doubt that the complementary protection criterion could be met by the enactment of a law without consideration of how that law would be applied to an applicant: at [31].
Determining the purpose for which the pain or suffering is inflicted will ultimately be a finding of fact for the decision-maker on the available evidence. With the exception of the fifth purpose, which is based on discrimination, the other purposes in the definition are aimed at achieving a specific outcome: obtaining information or a confession, punishment, intimidation or coercion, or a purpose related to those things. Although evidence as to the purpose of future harm may not always be available, the evidentiary basis for a conclusion that there is a real risk of harm may also point to the purpose of the harm.

While the purposes are drawn in part from the definition of ‘torture’ in art 1 of CAT, there are some distinct differences between the purposes in CAT and those in the Act. As such, international jurisprudence will be of limited value to the interpretation of the definition of torture in s 5(1) where it relates to harm inflicted for a purpose other than those listed in the Act.87

Obtaining information or a confession, punishing, or intimidating or coercing

The first three purposes listed in the definition of torture encompass severe pain or suffering being inflicted on an applicant for two objectives. Firstly, those purposes contemplate severe pain or suffering being inflicted on an applicant for the purpose of obtaining from the applicant information or a confession, punishing the applicant for an act which they have committed or are suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing the applicant. Secondly, they envisage severe pain or suffering being inflicted on an applicant for the purpose of obtaining information or a confession from a third person, punishing the applicant for an act which has been committed or is suspected of having been committed by a third person or inflicting severe pain or suffering on the applicant for the purpose of intimidating or coercing a third person.

A related purpose

The fourth purpose - any purpose related to a purpose mentioned in (a), (b) or (c) - contemplates that severe pain or suffering may amount to torture where it is not inflicted directly for the purpose of obtaining from the person or from a third person information or a confession; punishing the person for an act which that person or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed; or intimidating or coercing the person or a third person, but is inflicted for a purpose relating to one of those purposes. Whether a purpose is ‘related to’ obtaining information or a confession, punishment, or intimidation or coercion in respect of an applicant or a third person will be a question of fact.

Any reason based on discrimination that is inconsistent with the Articles of the ICCPR

Finally, an act or omission by which severe pain or suffering is intentionally inflicted on a person may amount to torture if inflicted for any reason based on discrimination that is inconsistent with the Articles of the ICCPR. Article 2 of the ICCPR refers to ‘distinction of any

---

87 The purposes in art 1 of CAT are not exhaustive, whereas those in the Act are. Further, CAT does not contain an equivalent of the fourth purpose in the Act (a purpose related to any of the first three purposes).
kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status'.

Depending on the circumstances, 'severe pain or suffering' which is intentionally inflicted for a discriminatory reason may also meet the threshold of 'serious harm' for one of the Convention or statutory reasons for the purpose of the criterion in s 36(2)(a) and, provided the other requirements of that criterion are met, in those circumstances it will not arise for consideration under s 36(2)(aa).

Cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment

The fourth type of 'significant harm' is that the non-citizen 'will be subjected to cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment': s 36(2A)(d). 'Cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment' is defined in s 5(1) of the Act as

- an act or omission by which:
  - (a) severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person; or
  - (b) pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person so long as, in all the circumstances, the act or omission could reasonably be regarded as cruel or inhuman in nature; but does not include an act or omission:
  - (c) that is not inconsistent with Article 7 of the [ICCPR]; or
  - (d) arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions that are not inconsistent with the Articles of the [ICCPR].

As with 'torture', this definition is intended to be exhaustive. The purpose of including an exhaustive definition was to confine the meaning of 'cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment' to circumstances that engage a non-refoulement obligation. A non-refoulement obligation is implied under arts 2 and 7 of the ICCPR.

Also in common with the definition of 'torture', cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment contains an intent requirement. A significant distinction, however, is that it does not require that the pain or suffering be inflicted for any particular purpose. The Explanatory Memorandum states that the first type of cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment, an act or omission by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person, refers to an act or omission which would normally constitute torture, but which is not inflicted for one of the purposes or reasons under the definition of 'torture'. The intent requirement is discussed further below. As with torture, there is no requirement that the harm be inflicted by a person acting in an official capacity.

The definition does not require the decision-maker to specify which element of 'cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment' is satisfied. It will therefore not be necessary to determine whether it is 'cruel' or 'inhuman', or whether it arises from 'treatment' or 'punishment' so long

---

88 Note that while this element of the definition varies from art 1 of CAT, which refers to 'any reason based on discrimination of any kind', there is unlikely to be any practical difference given the broad prohibition on discrimination in the ICCPR.

89 Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 at [19]–[20].

90 Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 at [16].

91 Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 at [15].

92 BPF15 v MIBP [2018] FCA 964 at [76] and [79].
as the definition as a whole is met, which would appear consistent with the approach in other jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{93}

Under the definition in s 5(1) and common to the definitions of ‘torture’ and ‘degrading treatment or punishment’, cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment does not include an act or omission ‘arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions that are not inconsistent with the Articles of the [ICCPR].’ This qualification, and the other elements of the definition, are discussed further below.

Article 7 of the ICCPR prohibits torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment but does not further define those terms. Instruments in other jurisdictions similarly provide protection to persons at risk of inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.\textsuperscript{94} However, that article, and similar provisions used in other jurisdictions, bundle the different types of harm within the one phrase. As such there are limits to the reliance which can be placed upon the international jurisprudence when considering the interpretation of ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ under the Act. For these purposes, regard must be had to the definition in s 5(1) of the Act.

\textbf{An act or omission}

Although the definition of cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment refers to ‘an act or omission’, pursuant to s 23(b) of the \textit{Acts Interpretation Act 1901 (Cth)} which provides that words in the singular number include the plural and words in the plural number include the singular, it appears that a number of acts or omissions intentionally inflicted could cumulatively amount to cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment where, when taken together, those acts or omissions would inflict severe pain or suffering or pain or suffering which could reasonably be regarded as cruel or inhuman in nature.

\textbf{(Severe) pain or suffering}

To amount to cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment, an act or omission must cause either ‘pain or suffering’ or ‘severe pain or suffering’, which can be either physical or mental. Whether an act or omission will cause pain or suffering, and whether such pain or suffering will be ‘severe’ will be a question for the decision-maker in each case. The structure of the definition suggests that the requirement of severity is linked to the pain or suffering, rather than the nature of the act or omission which causes it. Consistently with this, the Complementary Protection Guidelines state that the assessment is subjective, in that it depends on the characteristics of the victim (such as gender, age and state of health).\textsuperscript{95}

\textbf{An act or omission which... could reasonably be regarded as cruel or inhuman in

\textsuperscript{93} See McAdam, ‘Australian Complementary Protection’, above n 53 at 724.

\textsuperscript{94} For example, art 16(1) of CAT, art 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights, art 15 of the EU Qualification Directive (although neither of the latter two include the word ‘cruel’).

\textsuperscript{95} Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, sections 3.4.5.2 and 3.4.5.3, as re-issued 29 February 2020. Although the assessment of the pain or suffering may involve subjective elements relating to the victim, there must still be an actual, subjective intention to cause the relevant pain or suffering – see the discussion of ‘Intentionally inflicted’
An act or omission which causes pain or suffering, but which does not rise to the level of ‘severe’ may nonetheless amount to cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment so long as, in all the circumstances, the act or omission could reasonably be regarded as cruel or inhuman in nature.

Although this aspect of the definition does not refer directly to the ICCPR, the use of the more general ‘cruel or inhuman in nature’ may invite consideration of international jurisprudence as to what may be regarded as cruel or inhuman. In international jurisprudence, ‘inhuman treatment’ has been said to include such treatment that ‘deliberately causes severe suffering … which, in the particular situation, is unjustifiable’.

In international jurisprudence, ‘inhuman treatment’ has been said to include such treatment that ‘deliberately causes severe suffering … which, in the particular situation, is unjustifiable’.

In considering whether suffering inflicted in the context of law enforcement would point to inhuman treatment or punishment, international jurisprudence has held that the level of suffering must go beyond that ‘inevitable element of suffering or humiliation connected with a given form of legitimate treatment or punishment’. Such treatment may also fall within the ‘lawful sanctions’ qualification, discussed below.

Note that to amount to ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ an act or omission which can reasonably be regarded as ‘cruel or inhuman in nature’ must also cause pain or suffering which is intentionally inflicted and must not fall within either of the exceptions in (c) or (d). There is no requirement to consider whether an act or omission falls within parts (a) and (b) of the definition before considering whether one of the exceptions in parts (c) or (d) applies.

Intention

The definition of cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment in s 5(1) requires an element of intent. It is an act or omission by which severe pain or suffering, or pain or suffering, ‘is intentionally inflicted on a person’. Whether this requirement is met will involve similar considerations to those in relation to torture – see the discussion of ‘Intentionally inflicted’ under ‘Torture’ above.

Act or omission not inconsistent with art 7

Cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment does not include an act or omission that is not inconsistent with art 7 of the ICCPR: s 5(1). Article 7 provides that ‘no one shall be subjected

---

97 Labita v Italy, European Court of Human Rights, Application No 26772/95 (6 April 2000) at [120].
98 If having regard to international jurisprudence, decision-makers should bear in mind that other jurisdictions have not necessarily interpreted ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ as involving an intent requirement: see McAdam, Australian Complementary Protection, above n 53 at 698–699. On the contrary, the lack of intent has been identified as a means of distinguishing cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment from torture, whereas under the s 5(1) definitions, the key feature distinguishing torture from cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment is the ‘purpose’ requirement.
to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In particular, no one shall be subjected without his free consent to medical or scientific experimentation’. Although it appears somewhat circular, the purpose of this exception is to confine the meaning of cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment to circumstances that engage a non-refoulement obligation.100 As such, this requirement may be regarded as informing the meaning of ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ in that an act or omission which is of a level which would not breach art 7 will not suffice, even if it satisfies other elements of the definition, thereby imposing a basic threshold of treatment or punishment which would fall within the definition in s 5(1). When determining whether or not an act or omission is not inconsistent with art 7, regard may be had to international jurisprudence interpreting that Article.

The Complementary Protection Guidelines refer to certain circumstances which will generally not be considered inconsistent with art 7. These include general socio-economic conditions, breach of social and economic rights, absence or inadequacy of medical treatment or imposition of treatment without consent, where that treatment is a medical or therapeutic necessity.101 However, the Federal Circuit Court has said that while circumstances where such things may amount to significant harm may be few, they need to be determined with actual reference to an applicant’s circumstances rather than in the abstract.102 The Complementary Protection Guidelines also provide examples of treatment which are ‘very likely’ to constitute breaches of art 7, including rape, female genital mutilation, forced abortion and forced sterilisation and, in some cases, circumstances arising from a forced marriage and domestic violence.103

Degrading treatment or punishment

The fifth and final type of significant harm under s 36(2A) is that the non-citizen ‘will be subjected to degrading treatment or punishment’: s 36(2A)(e). ‘Degrading treatment or punishment’ is again exhaustively defined in s 5(1) of the Act and means:

an act or omission that causes, and is intended to cause, extreme humiliation which is unreasonable, but does not include an act or omission:

(a) that is not inconsistent with Article 7 of the [ICCPR], or

(b) that causes, and is intended to cause, extreme humiliation arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions that are not inconsistent with the Articles of the [ICCPR].

---

100 SZUE v MIBP [2016] FCCA 2052 at [26].
101 Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 at [19].
102 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, sections 3.4.7.1 and 3.4.7.2, as re-issued 29 February 2020. The Guidelines state that it is possible that, in exceptional circumstances, a state may breach Article 7 if it takes deliberate action against a particular person or group which causes severe socio-economic deprivation through the denial of shelter, food or the most basic necessities of life. Treatment may be more likely to breach Article 7 where the persons affected are vulnerable and wholly dependent on the state for their wellbeing; at section 3.4.7.1. Likewise the Guidelines state that in cases involving medical harm or mistreatment or absence of care, non-refoulement obligations would only arise in very exceptional circumstances; at section 3.4.7.2.
103 SZSMQ v MIBP [2013] FCCA 1768 at [114]. The Court referred to circumstances such as payment for medical expenses and inability to attain employment. Also see ‘notes’ in Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, sections 3.4.7.1 and 3.4.7.2, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
104 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, sections 3.4.7.3 and 3.4.7.4, as re-issued 29 February 2020. See also FMN1 v MICMSMA [2020] FCA 326 where the Federal Court was of the view that forced marriage would in most cases constitute ‘degrading treatment or punishment’: at [43]–[44].
This definition derives from the non-refoulement obligation implied under arts 2 and 7 of the ICCPR and is intended to cover acts or omissions which, when carried out, would violate art 7 of the ICCPR.\textsuperscript{104} As with the definition of ‘cruel or degrading treatment or punishment’, there is no requirement that the harm be inflicted by a person acting in an official capacity or for a particular purpose.\textsuperscript{105} While there is no requirement for the treatment to be discriminatory, in some circumstances discrimination (e.g. on a racial basis) might render treatment that was otherwise bearable inherently degrading.\textsuperscript{106}

As with the definitions of ‘torture’ and ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’, under the definition in s 5(1), degrading treatment or punishment does not include an act or omission ‘that causes, and is intended to cause, extreme humiliation arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions that are not inconsistent with the Articles of the [ICCPR].’ This qualification, and the other elements of the definition, are discussed further below.

An act or omission

As discussed above in relation to the definitions of torture and cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment, although the definition of degrading treatment or punishment refers to ‘an act or omission’, pursuant to s 23(b) of the Acts Interpretation Act 1901 (Cth) which provides that words in the singular number include the plural and words in the plural number include the singular, it appears that a number of acts or omissions could cumulatively amount to degrading treatment or punishment where, when those acts are taken together, the level of humiliation rises to extreme humiliation which is unreasonable.

Extreme humiliation which is unreasonable

The definition of degrading treatment or punishment in s 5(1) is specific as to the level of humiliation which must be evoked by the particular act or omission. It requires ‘extreme humiliation which is unreasonable’.\textsuperscript{107} Drawing upon international jurisprudence, the Complementary Protection Guidelines provide:

Treatment may be degrading if it ‘humiliates or debases an individual, showing a lack of respect for, or diminishing his or her human dignity, or arouses feelings of fear, anguish or inferiority capable of breaking an individual’s moral and physical resistance’. In this regard, humiliation may be in either the eyes of others, or the eyes of the victim themselves. Treatment may also be said to be degrading if it grossly humiliates a person in front of others, or drives the person to act against their will or conscience...

\textsuperscript{104} Explanatory Memorandum to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 at [23]–[24].

\textsuperscript{105} In BPF15 v MIBP [2018] FCA 964, the Court held that there is no requirement that ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ or ‘degrading treatment or punishment’ be carried out in an official capacity: at [76] and [79].

\textsuperscript{106} In SZSVT v MIBP [2014] FCCA 768, the Court indicated in obiter dicta comments that it was prepared to accept that the natural race of differential treatment could render it inherently degrading in certain circumstances, however it was unnecessary to decide that question as no such claim was squarely raised before the Tribunal: at [62], [80]–[82].

\textsuperscript{107} Jurisprudence in other jurisdictions refers to ‘gross humiliation’ (see Greek case, European Commission on Human Rights, Application Nos 3321/67, 3322/67, 3323/67, 3324/67 (18 November 1969), 12 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 170, 186; East African Asians v United Kingdom (1973) 3 EHRR 76, [189], [195] cited in McAdam, Complementary Protection in International Refugee Law, above n 96, at 141–142 and has also characterised degrading treatment as occurring where treatment humiliates or debases an individual, showing a lack of respect for, or diminishing, his or her human dignity, or arouses feelings of fear, anguish, or inferiority capable of breaking an individual’s moral and physical resistance: Pretty v United Kingdom (2002) 35 EHRR 1 at [52] cited in McAdam, ‘Australian Complementary Protection’, above n 53 at 705–706. Such descriptions may be useful for gauging the level of humiliation which could amount to ‘extreme’.
Whether or not the treatment or punishment is performed in public may be a relevant factor in determining if it causes extreme humiliation, although the failure to publicise particular treatment or punishment will not prevent it from being characterised as degrading.

A measure that does not involve physical ill-treatment but lowers a person in rank, position, reputation or character may also amount to degrading treatment where it interferes with the person's human dignity.

The assessment of the minimum level of severity necessary to constitute 'extreme humiliation' will depend on all the circumstances of the case, including the nature and context of the treatment, its duration, its physical or mental effects and, in some instances, the gender, age, state of health or other status of the victim.

Whether or not humiliation is 'reasonable' will also be a question to be determined with regard to the particular circumstances of the case. For example, in SZRSN v MIAC the Federal Magistrates Court found that forced separation of an applicant from his children would not meet the high threshold of 'extreme humiliation' which is unreasonable.

Similarly, in SZZSFX v MIBP the Federal Circuit Court considered that exposure to pollution does not of itself amount to 'degrading treatment' for the purposes of s 36(2)(aa) of the Migration Act. That Court has also rejected that a fine and brief period of detention pending bail could amount to 'extreme humiliation'. Conversely, the Federal Court has held that forced marriage is 'an act which should be characterised as intended to cause humiliation; that humiliation would in most cases certainly be extreme and be entirely unreasonable.

The Complementary Protection Guidelines direct decision-makers to apply the principle of proportionality, in light of the specific circumstances of each case, when determining whether the treatment is unreasonable.

Intention

Like the definitions of torture and cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment, degrading treatment or punishment requires an element of intent – it must be an act or omission which causes and is intended to cause extreme humiliation which is unreasonable. This is

---

108 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.6.2, as re-issued 29 February 2020. Although the assessment of whether the act or omission amounts to 'extreme humiliation' may depend on subjective elements relating to the victim, there must still be an actual, subjective intention to cause the extreme humiliation – see the discussion of 'Intentionally inflicted' under 'Torture' above.

109 SZRSN v MIAC [2013] FMCA 78 at [66] (upheld on appeal, but this aspect of the reasoning was not expressly considered). In SZRUT v MIBP [2013] FCCA 368 at [26] the Court accepted that 'criticism' on its own could not amount to significant harm given the definition in s. 36(2A) of the Act (upheld on appeal, although the Court did not make any findings on that point: SZRUT v MIBP [2013] FCA 1276).

110 SZZSFX v MIBP [2013] FCCA 1309. The Court stated that even if such a claim could be made it would have to be considered in context of the generalised risk qualification in s 36(2B)(c).

111 AGH15 v MIBP [2015] FCCA 1977 at [56] (upheld on appeal, but this aspect of the reasoning was not considered: AGH15 v MIBP [2015] FCA 1181).

112 FMN17 v MICMMSA [2020] FCA 326 at [44]. In reaching its findings that the Tribunal erred in its consideration of whether forced marriage of a child applicant upon removal to Pakistan could amount to significant harm, the Court referred to UK jurisprudence on forced marriage in R. (on the application of Quila) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2012] 1 AC 621, which referred to forced marriage as an 'appalling evil': at [26]–[29] and [50]. See also Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.7.4, as re-issued 29 February 2020.

113 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.6.3, as re-issued 29 February 2020.

114 The intention element of degrading treatment or punishment was considered in CVJ15 v MIBP [2016] FCCA 2897, where the Court confirmed that actual intention to cause the relevant humiliation is required: at [22].
differently worded from the intent requirement in those other definitions but it involves similar considerations — see the discussion of ‘Intentionally inflicted’ under ‘Torture’ above.

Act or omission not inconsistent with art 7

As with the definition of cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment discussed, the definition of degrading treatment or punishment does not include an act or omission that is not inconsistent with art 7 of the ICCPR. As such, an act or omission which is of a level which would not breach art 7 will not amount to degrading treatment or punishment, even if it satisfies other elements of the definition.

In considering whether humiliation inflicted in the context of law enforcement would point to degrading treatment or punishment, international jurisprudence has held that the level of humiliation must go beyond that ‘inevitable element of suffering or humiliation connected with a given form of legitimate treatment or punishment’. In any event, depending upon the circumstances such treatment may fall within the ‘lawful sanctions’ qualification.

Lawful sanctions

Under the definitions in s 5(1), torture, cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment and degrading treatment or punishment do not include an act or omission ‘arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions that are not inconsistent with the Articles of the Covenant.’ As such, an act or omission that arises from, is inherent in or incidental to a lawful sanction, where that sanction itself does not breach the Articles of the ICCPR, will not amount to torture, cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment or degrading treatment or punishment, even if it inflicts (severe) pain or suffering or extreme humiliation. The imposition of a lawful sanctions qualification appears to derive from art 1 of CAT which states that ‘torture’ does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions’.

The Complementary Protection Guidelines state that if a claimed lawful sanction meets the requisite level of severity necessary to constitute torture, cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment, or degrading treatment or punishment within the meaning of the Act, it will necessarily be inconsistent with the ICCPR and that in such a case, there is no need for decision-makers to determine whether the sanction is lawful. The Guidelines include examples of treatment pursuant to lawful sanctions which will or will not amount to torture, cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment or degrading treatment or punishment, particularly relating to imprisonment or prison conditions. The Guidelines state that detention itself is not a breach of art 7, although particularly harsh conditions in detention may be. Prison conditions which seriously or systematically deprive a detainee of human dignity may 115 See, for example SZTAL v MIBP; Sztgm v MIBP (2017) 262 CLR 362 at [26]–[29].

---

116 Labita v Italy, European Court of Human Rights, Application No 26772/95 (6 April 2000) at [120].

117 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.8, as re-issued 29 February 2020.

118 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, sections 3.4.8.1–3.4.8.3, as re-issued 29 February 2020.

119 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.8.3, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The Guidelines outline examples of conditions that have been held to constitute breaches of art 7 by the UN Human Rights Committee. They indicate that while one relatively minor adverse condition (such as a small cell) may not, of itself, be of sufficient severity to breach art 7, the accumulation of a combination of poor or unreasonably restrictive conditions (e.g. a small cell, overcrowding, prolonged detention and lack of exercise opportunities) may raise the severity above the necessary threshold.

Consistent with the approach advocated in the Guidelines to assessing whether harm meets the pain or suffering, or humiliation threshold in the s 5(1) definitions, the Guidelines state that assessment of whether lawful sanctions breach art 7 is subjective and depends upon the particular characteristics of the victim.

The discussion in the Guidelines of sanctions suggests that the consideration of whether a lawful sanction is inconsistent with the articles of the ICCPR requires consideration only of whether the sanction is consistent with art 7 of the ICCPR. However, this appears to impose a limit on the scope of the ‘lawful sanctions’ exception that is more narrow than the Act itself, which refers to inconsistency with the ‘Articles of the ICCPR’ (not only art 7).

Whether a sanction is ‘inconsistent with the Articles of the ICCPR’ may be assessed by reference to the content of those Articles and international jurisprudence interpreting them. A sanction may be inconsistent with the Articles of the ICCPR in different ways. It may be considered inconsistent if it breaches one of the rights or obligations imposed by the Articles, or if it is inconsistent with a prohibition or breaches an obligation aimed at providing certain protections in the imposition of lawful sanctions.

The lawful sanctions qualification applies only to treatment which arises from, is inherent in or incidental to the sanction. In some cases, an applicant may claim that they are at risk of treatment which, while occurring during the course of the imposition of a lawful sanction, is not in fact inherent in or incidental to the sanction, such as mistreatment at the hands of rogue prison officials. Whether or not an act or omission arises from, is inherent in or incidental to a sanction, and whether that sanction is ‘lawful’, will ultimately be a question of fact to be determined on the evidence. This qualification appears to have been included

---

120 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.8.3, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
121 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.8.3, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
122 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.8.3, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
123 Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.4.8, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
124 For example, the UN Human Rights Committee has held that corporal punishment is a violation of art 7 of the ICCPR: Views, Communication No 759/1997, 68th sess, UN Doc CCPR/C/68/D/759/1997 (13 April 2000) at [9.1] (‘Osbourne v Jamaica’).
125 Note that there is an exception in the ICCPR for times of public emergency which allows states to take measures which derogate from their obligations under the ICCPR to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with their other obligations under international law and do not involve discrimination solely on the grounds of race, colour, sex, language, religion or social origin. However, that exception does not allow for derogation from arts 6, 7, 8, 11, 15, 16, or 18 (respectively, the right to life and prohibition on arbitrary deprivation of life; prohibition on torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; prohibition on slavery and servitude; prohibition on imprisonment on the basis to fulfil a contractual obligation; prohibition on retrospective criminal laws; right to recognition as a person before the law; right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion). Further, some rights are expressed as subject to certain limitations necessary to protect national security, public order, public health or morals or the rights and freedoms of others (e.g. arts 12, 18, 19, 21, 22).
126 In BPF15 v MBP [2018] FCA 964, the Court described as ‘persuasive’ an argument by the Minister that the harm the appellant faced while detained for up to several days on return to Sri Lanka as a result of departing illegally, could only be incidental to the lawful sanction being applied under a law of general application and would therefore not amount to as a safeguard and in practice may not require detailed consideration, as it is difficult to envisage treatment or punishment which meets the other requirements of the definitions yet is consistent with the Articles of the ICCPR.

Perpetrator of the harm

The Act is silent as to whether significant harm for the purpose of ss 36(2)(aa) and 36(2A) necessarily involves a perpetrator, and if so, the identity of that perpetrator. While on one view this may leave open the possibility that harm inflicted by an applicant upon themselves (or otherwise suffered without a perpetrator) or harm stemming from the actual act of removal of the applicant from Australia could fall within the scope of s 36(2)(aa), it would appear from the words of s 36(2)(aa), s 36(2A) and s 5(1) that these provisions do not encompass harm of that nature.

Self-harm or harm not resulting from actions of others

The descriptions of the types of significant harm in s 36(2A) are passively worded, referring to the non-citizen being arbitrarily deprived of his or her life, the death penalty being carried out on the non-citizen, and harm that the non-citizen will be subjected to. The Federal Court has confirmed that the definition in s 36(2A) is framed in terms of harm suffered because of the acts of other persons.127 It does not encompass self-harm, harm arising from mental illness or harm that a non-citizen would suffer as a result of any other illnesses arising on return to a receiving country.128

Harm caused by removing the applicant from Australia

An applicant may claim that the very act of removal from Australia to a receiving country will result in harm. For example, the resulting separation from friends or family, or poorer living conditions, or lack of access to essential services.

The judgments in SZRSN v MIAC and GLD18 v MHA confirm that separation from one’s family members in Australia or another country, where the claimed harm arises from the act of removal itself, will not meet the definitions of ‘significant harm’ in s 36(2A).129

---

127 The language in ss 36(2A)(a)–(b) and in the definitions of the concepts in ss 36(2A)(c)–(e) all concern, and only concern, how a visa applicant might be treated by another person: GLD18 v MHA [2020] FCAFC 2 at [37].

128 CHB16 v MIBP [2019] FCA 1089 at [65]–[68] (special leave to appeal from this judgment was refused: CHB16 v MIBP [2019] HCASL 377); and CSV15 v MIBP [2018] FCA 699 at [34]. The majority in GLD18 v MHA [2020] FCAFC 2 at [89] confirmed that there was nothing erroneous in the Courts’ statements in CHB16 and CSV15 that self-inflicted harm does not constitute ‘significant harm’, and at [90] noted that it is the intentional infliction of mental harm by others (which may cause a person to engage in self-harm) that is critical to the satisfaction of s 36(2)(aa). However, Snaden J in obiter at [103] saw ‘no obvious reason’ why self-harm might not qualify as a risk of the kind to which s 36(2)(aa) is directed and ‘would be slow to conclude that ‘significant harm’ extends no further, conceptually, than to harm that a visa applicant might endure at the hands of others’. See also SZDCD v MIBP [2019] FCA 326 where the Court held that deprivation of an appellant’s access to medical treatment in Australia as a consequence of his removal to Bangladesh would not amount to ‘arbitrarily deprived of his life under s 36(2)(a)’: at [48]; and E22C18 v MHA [2019] FCA 2143 where the Court upheld the Tribunal’s finding that suicide could not constitute the ‘arbitrary deprivation of life’ in s 36(2)(a): at [47].

In SZRSN the applicant claimed that significant harm would arise from separating him from his Australian children. The Court upheld the reasoning of the Federal Magistrate at first instance, which turned on the relationship between various aspects of the complementary protection provisions. Firstly, the Court had regard to the reference in s 36(2)(aa) to Australia’s ‘protection obligations’ as referring to the obligation to afford protection to a non-citizen where the harm faced arises in the receiving country, rather than in the State where protection is sought. Secondly, the Court reasoned that the qualifications in s 36(2B) (discussed below) expressly refer to harm ‘in a country’ which is necessarily the receiving country if the circumstances of ss 36(2B)(a) (relocation) and 36(2B)(b) (protection from an authority) are to have any application.

Further, the Court noted the circularity in the operation of s 36(2)(aa) if the harm arose from the act of removal itself. Section 36(2)(aa) requires that the real risk of significant harm must arise ‘as a necessary and foreseeable consequence of the non-citizen being removed from Australia to a receiving country’. The Court stated that the fact that the significant harm must be a consequence of the removal strongly suggests that the removal itself cannot be the significant harm.

Lastly, the Court in SZRSN v MIAC had regard to the ‘intention’ requirements in the s 5(1) definition of degrading treatment or punishment. The Court reasoned that separation from family (in that case, children) is the consequence of removal, and a consequence cannot be said to have an ‘intention’, so the act of removal itself cannot be said to be perpetrated by the State with the intention to cause extreme humiliation that is unreasonable.

In GLD18 v MHA the applicant claimed he would suffer significant harm if he was returned to the UK because he would be separated from his daughter and the site of his son’s grave in Australia. After undertaking a similar analysis to that in SZRSN, the Full Federal Court confirmed that SZRSN was correct about the scope and operation of the concept of ‘significant harm’ as part of the protection visa criterion in s 36(2)(aa). It also held that regardless of the location or visa status of other family members, the authority of the approach set out in SZRSN would continue to apply and any claim of harm arising from family separation resulting purely from an applicant’s removal from Australia will not satisfy s 36(2)(aa).

---

130 GLD18 v MHA [2020] FCAFC 2 at [36]–[50], [94]. The Court reached its view after considering the text of s 36(2)(a), the definitions of significant harm, the exceptions in s 36(2B), and the purpose of the complementary protection criterion as explained in previous authorities and the explanatory memorandum to the bill that introduced it.

131 SZRSN was distinguished in MZAEN v MIBP [2016] FCA 620 and AUB16 v MIBP [2017] FCCA 2634 on the basis that the applicants would suffer significant harm as a result of being separated from one another in different receiving countries. However, the Court in GLD18 v MHA effectively overruled these Federal Circuit Court decisions. It held that whether or not the children are Australian citizens, whether the children might be taken to a third country, whether or not the children themselves have protection visas in Australia, whether the appellant and his child have different nationalities, or whether the harm involved may include physical self-harm, does not have any impact on the applicability of SZRSN at [52]–[58], [67].
Although the Court in SZRSN was largely focusing on degrading treatment or punishment, by implication its reasoning is equally applicable to the other types of significant harm in s 36(2A). Furthermore, the Court’s reasoning in GLD18 clearly extended to all types of significant harm. Accordingly, although the risk of significant harm envisaged by s 36(2)(aa) must arise as a necessary and foreseeable consequence of the applicant being removed from Australia to a receiving country, s 36(2)(aa) will not be engaged by harm inflicted by the act of removal itself.

Circumstances in which there is taken not to be a real risk

Section 36(2B) qualifies s 36(2)(aa) by setting out three circumstances in which there is taken not to be a real risk that a non-citizen will suffer significant harm in a country. In order to find that an applicant meets s 36(2)(aa), decision-makers will need to be satisfied that none of these circumstances exist. Conversely, if a decision-maker finds that there is no real risk an applicant will suffer significant harm, there is no need to consider any of the circumstances under s 36(2A). Further, if a decision maker finds that one of the circumstances under s 36(2A) apply, there is no need to consider any of the others.

The circumstances are:

- where it would be reasonable for the applicant to relocate to an area of the country where there would not be a real risk that the applicant will suffer significant harm;
- where the applicant could obtain, from an authority of the country, protection such that there would not be a real risk that the non-citizen will suffer significant harm; or
- the real risk is one faced by the population of the country generally and is not faced by the non-citizen personally.

The inquiry under s 36(2B) is into the particular circumstances that appertain to the applicant, and should be considered together with the assessment of ‘real risk’ in s 36(2)(aa).

The qualifications as to relocation and protection from an authority, and to a degree, personal risk, are broadly similar to issues which arise for consideration under art 1 of the Refugees Convention. Although s 36(2B) is not expressed to apply only to consideration under s 36(2)(aa), the reference to ‘real risk’ and ‘significant harm’ in effect confines its operation to that criterion. Despite the similarity of some of the concepts in those 137 Those aspects of the Court’s reasoning in SZRSN v MIAC [2013] FCA 751 which turn on the definition of ‘degrading treatment or punishment’ in s 5(1) of the Act appear equally applicable to the definitions of ‘torture’ and ‘cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment’ as they each require an ‘act or omission’ by which pain or suffering is intentionally inflicted. In GLD18 v MHA [2020] FCAFC 2, the Full Court held that at both a textual and purposive level, the concept of ‘significant harm’ is concerned with acts or omissions occurring in the relevant receiving country and which result in the applicant being treated in a particular way. The language of s 36(2A)(c)–(e) all concern, and only concern, how a visa applicant might be treated by another person, which is confirmed by the use of the term ‘subjected’ in s 36(2A)(c)–(e), and is inherent in the text of ss 36(2A)(a) (‘the non-citizen will be arbitrarily deprived of his or her life’) and (b) (‘the death penalty will be carried out on the non-citizen’): at [37].

---

138 See for example ANT18 v MICMSMA [2020] FCA 292 at [24].

139 In MIAC v MZYYL (2012) 207 FCR 211 at [36] the Court stated that the section must be read as a whole, and that the qualifications to those relevant to the Refugees Convention, s 36(2B) does not mimic the tests as they have been developed in that context, and is subject to different interpretation. The s 36(2B) qualifications are discussed in turn below.

Relocation

The first qualification under s 36(2B) is that there is taken not to be a real risk that a non-citizen will suffer significant harm in a country if the Minister is satisfied that ‘it would be reasonable for the non-citizen to relocate to an area of the country where there would not be a real risk that the non-citizen will suffer significant harm’: s 36(2B)(a).

The test in s 36(2B)(a) broadly reflects the relocation test in the Refugees Convention context – that is, that depending on the circumstances of the particular case, it may be reasonable for an applicant to relocate in their country to a region where, objectively, there is no appreciable risk of the occurrence of the feared harm.140 There is an existing body of Australian case law on the principles which apply when considering relocation in that context. The Federal Court has confirmed that the issues which arise when considering the reasonableness of relocation in the refugee context are the same which arise in the complementary protection context.141 Federal Circuit Court authority suggests that where those issues have already been considered in relation to the refugee criterion (as in effect prior to 16 December 2014142), it may be open to the tribunal to refer to those earlier findings when addressing the complementary protection criterion.143

The first question which arises in assessing relocation is whether there is an area of the country where, objectively, there would not be a real risk that the applicant will suffer significant harm, that is, whether the real risk of harm is localised rather than nation-wide.144 If satisfied that the risk of harm is localised, it then becomes relevant to consider whether it would be reasonable to expect the applicant to relocate to another area where there is not a real risk of significant harm (whether the harm initially feared, or another type of significant harm), including risks of generalised violence.146

What is reasonable, in the sense of practicable, must depend upon the particular circumstances of the applicant and the impact upon that person of relocating within their country.147 The range of factors that may be relevant in any particular case to the question of whether relocation is reasonably available will be largely determined by the case sought to be made out by an applicant and the material before the decision-maker.148 The consideration does not require a comparison of hardships between an applicant’s home area and the proposed area of relocation.149 The question that arises under s 36(2)(a) is whether it is reasonable for the particular protection visa applicant to relocate.150

The principles relevant to the ‘relocation’ test are discussed in detail in Chapter 6 - Relocation.

Protection from an authority

Under s 36(2B), there is taken not to be a real risk of significant harm if the non-citizen ‘could obtain, from an authority of the country, protection such that there would not be a real risk that the non-citizen will suffer significant harm’: s 36(2B)(b).

Section 36(2B)(b) refers to an applicant obtaining, from an authority of the country, protection such that there would not be a real risk that the applicant would suffer significant harm. In MIAC v MZYYL the Full Federal Court held that, to satisfy s 36(2B)(b), the level of protection offered by the receiving country must reduce the risk of significant harm to something less than a real one.151 In that sense, there is some overlap between this

---

145 See MZYXS v MIAC [2013] FCA 614 at [39] where the Court confirmed that it was appropriate for the Tribunal to draw guidance from the High Court judgments of SZATV v MIAC (2007) 233 CLR 18 and SZFDV v MIAC (2007) 233 CLR 51 when considering reasonableness of relocation. If consideration is given to whether there is protection of an authority available in the area of proposed relocation, the relevant standard of protection for the purpose of ss 36(2)(aa) and 36(2B)(a) would be that in s 36(2B)(b) (protection such that there is not a real risk of harm) rather than the ‘adequate protection’ standard which applies under the refugee criterion.

146 In SZSSM v MIBP [2013] FCCA 1489 at [98] and [100]–[104] the Court found error on the basis that the Tribunal had focused on the applicant’s Convention attributes when considering the risk of significant harm on relocation, rather than whether there was a risk of harm as a result of generalised violence, even if that violence was sectarian in nature. The Court further stated the Tribunal could not avoid consideration of s 36(2B)(c) in addressing the generalised violence claim.

147 SZATV v MIAC (2007) 233 CLR 18 at [24]. Note however that in the context of the Refugees Convention, there is authority that the Refugees Convention is concerned with persecution, not human rights more generally and that reasonableness should not be judged by reference to human rights norms (see SZFDV v MIAC (2007) 233 CLR 51 at [33]; SZATV v MIAC (2007) 233 CLR 18 at [72]; Januzi v SSHD [2006] 2 AC 426 at 457, as quoted in SZATV v MIAC (2007) 233 CLR 18 at [25].

148 This limitation on reference to human rights standards may not sit easily with relocation in the context of s 36(2B)(a), given the express references in the Explanatory Memorandum (e.g. at 1) to obligations under the ICCPR, which is directed at human rights more widely, although unlike s 36(2)(a), s 36(2)(aa) and related provisions do not incorporate international obligations arising from the ICCPR.

149 Randhawa v MILGEA (1994) 52 FCR 437 at 443, 453, and, applying this to s 36(2B)(a), AZAEH v MIBP [2015] FCA 414 at [21]. See Chapter 6 - Relocation of this Guide for further discussions and examples in relation to factors found to be relevant to the consideration of relocation.

150 MIBP v MZZEV [2014] FCCA 22 at [61]–[63] and MIBP v MZZGD [2014] FCCA 60 at [32]–[33], [42].

151 AZAEH v MIBP [2015] FCA 414, where the Court held that to require that consideration of the best interests of children who are not applicants for protection is to focus on the wrong person. However, the Court observed in obiter that that is not to say that the circumstances of dependent children who are not applicants need necessarily be left out or treated as secondary – the extent to which such matters require consideration would depend upon the case made by the applicant: at [30], [34].

152 MIAC v MZYYL [2012] 207 FCR 211 at [40]. In that case, the Minister had appealed against a decision of the Tribunal which had found that the applicant could not obtain from an authority of the receiving country protection such that there qualification and the assessment of ‘real risk’ under s 36(2)(aa), which necessarily involves consideration of a range of matters, including the availability of protection from the authorities.\textsuperscript{152}

The Complementary Protection Guidelines state that an authority can be the State, including its government and related forces (or those acting with the authority of the State) or it can be a non-State authority, such as a rebel or military force with effective control of the area.\textsuperscript{153} However, the text of s 36(2B)(b), which refers to ‘an authority of the country’, appears to require that the protection be provided by an authority of the State. As such, protection from a body or person \textit{other than} an authority of the country would not be sufficient to engage the qualification, but would be relevant to the assessment of whether there is a real risk for the purpose of s 36(2)(aa).

Although the qualification in s 36(2B)(b) bears some similarity to the consideration of ‘state protection’ for the purpose of determining whether an applicant’s fear of persecution is well-founded in the refugee sense, it is to be contrasted with that test. The test in s 36(2B)(b) is differently expressed to the state protection test as understood in Australian refugee law, where the relevant standard is an adequate or effective, rather than perfect, level of protection.\textsuperscript{154} In emphasising that the express terms of s 36(2B)(b) require the Minister to be satisfied that the protection available would remove the real risk of significant harm, the Court in \textit{MZYYL} expressly rejected that s 36(2B)(b) requires only that the receiving country have an effective legal system for detection, prosecution and punishment, or a system that meets ‘international standards’.\textsuperscript{155} The Complementary Protection Guidelines also state that where the State can only realistically provide reasonably effective protection measures, decision makers must still assess whether such measures reduce the risk of harm to something less than a real risk, and that in some cases this may require the decision maker to be satisfied that the receiving country would take specific measures to protect a person.\textsuperscript{156}

Given the different standard implied by the language in s 36(2B)(b), judicial authority on the state protection test in the refugee context will not be directly applicable to assessment of the level of protection from an authority required by s 36(2B)(b).

\section*{A risk faced by the population generally}

The final qualification in s 36(2B) is that there is taken not to be a real risk that an applicant will suffer significant harm in a country if ‘the real risk is one faced by the population generally and is not faced by the applicant personally’: s 36(2B)(c). The language of the \textsuperscript{152} In \textit{MIAC v MZYYL} (2012) 207 FCR 211 the Court stated at \[36\] that the section must be read as a whole, and that the enquiry provided for in s 36(2)(aa) necessarily involves consideration of the matters referred to in s 36(2B).

\textsuperscript{153} Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.6.2, as re-issued 29 February 2020.

\textsuperscript{154} Under the Convention, the standard is an adequate or reasonable standard, rather than a perfect one, which standard does not require the state to guarantee the safety of its citizens from harm caused by non-state agents: \textit{MIMA v Respondents} S152/2003/[2004] 222 CLR 1 at \[26\] and \[117\]. Similarly, for the codified definition in s 5H, s 5J(2) requires an ‘effective’ (as defined in s 5LA) level of protection, rather than a guarantee. See \textit{Chapter 8 – State protection} for further discussion.

\textsuperscript{155} Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.6.2, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
qualification and its meaning is not explained in the Explanatory Memorandum to the Bill that introduced the provision, nor in the associated Second Reading Speech.\(^\text{157}\) However it has been the subject of some judicial consideration.

The Federal Court has held that the natural and ordinary meaning of s 36(2B)(c) requires the decision-maker to determine whether the risk is faced by the population of a country generally as opposed to the individual claiming complementary protection based on his or her individual exposure to that risk.\(^\text{158}\) In \textit{SZSPT v MIBP} the Court held that, while every citizen who broke a law of general application would necessarily face a risk of punishment personally, s 36(2B)(c) applied because it was no different from the risk faced by the population generally.\(^\text{159}\) The Court’s reasoning suggests that the ‘faced personally’ element of this qualification requires the individual to face a risk of differential treatment, or because of characteristics that distinguish them from the general populace.\(^\text{160}\) This approach has also been taken in relation to the risk of harm from inadequate medical treatment.\(^\text{161}\) Similarly, it has been held that a risk faced ‘personally’ is one that is particular to the individual and is not attributable to his or her membership of the population of the country, or shared by that population group in general.\(^\text{162}\) In \textit{BBK15 v MIBP} the Federal Court held that the ‘population of the country generally’ refers to the commonly understood concept of the general population, such that there is no requirement that the risk be faced by all members or every citizen of a country’s population for s 36(2B)(c) to apply.\(^\text{163}\) These cases make it apparent that where a real risk is faced by an individual applicant, but is the same as the risk faced by the general population, s 36(2B)(c) applies.

However, there is some tension between the approach in the above cases and that in the Complementary Protection Guidelines, which state that while a particular individual must face a real risk in light of their specific circumstances, it is not necessary to show that the individual would be ‘singled out’ or targeted.\(^\text{164}\) Although this approach has found some support in the courts, it appears that it should not be followed in light of the binding

\(^{157}\) The qualification is not explained in the Explanatory Memorandum, although the Explanatory Memorandum does comment (at [67]) in relation to the test in s 36(2)(aa) that ‘[t]he danger of harm must be personal and present’. The Second Reading Speech to the Migration Amendment (Complementary Protection) Bill 2011 states ‘a personal or direct risk can be found in instances where the significant harm is faced by a broad group, so long as that harm is personally faced by the person seeking protection’: Commonwealth of Australia, Parliamentary Debates, House of Representatives, 24 February 2011, 1357 (Chris Bowen, Minister for Immigration and Citizenship).

\(^{158}\) \textit{SZSPT v MIBP} [2014] FCA 1245 at [11]–[13]. An application for special leave to appeal this aspect of the judgment was dismissed by the High Court: \textit{SZSPT v MIBP} [2015] HCASL 114. See also comments of the court to similar effect in: the judgment at first instance in \textit{SZSPT v MIBP} [2014] FCCA 1388 at [15] (the provision would apply in a situation of ‘universal danger’, but not where the situation was ‘worse for a person of [a particular] ethnicity’); \textit{SZFF v MIBP} [2013] FCCA 1884 at [33], [49] (risk must be ‘faced by the individual personally in light of the individual’s specific circumstances’); \textit{SZTES v MIBP} [2014] FCCA 1765 at [24] (risk must be ‘particular to the individual’); \textit{SZSRY v MIBP} [2013] FCCA 1284 at [43] (risk must be faced ‘in light of [the applicant’s] specific circumstances’).

\(^{159}\) \textit{SZSPT v MIBP} [2014] FCA 1245. In this regard, the Court observed that there was no differential treatment as the law was one of general application and was not applied in a discriminatory manner: at [12]–[14].

\(^{160}\) \textit{SZSPT v MIBP} [2014] FCA 1245 at [11]–[15].

\(^{161}\) \textit{MZAAJ v MIBP} [2015] FCA 478 at [6] where the Court endorsed the Tribunal’s finding that the risk of harm was a risk faced by all Sri Lankans.

\(^{162}\) \textit{SZTES v MIBP} [2014] FCCA 1765 at [23]–[24], citing \textit{SZSRY v MIBP} [2013] FCCA 1284. In \textit{SZTES v MIBP}, the Court found there was no error in the Tribunal’s finding that harm from insurgent attacks in Kabul was faced by the population generally and not by the applicant personally. An application for leave to appeal from the judgment was dismissed by the Federal Court: \textit{SZTES v MIBP} [2015] FCCA 719.

\(^{163}\) \textit{BBK15 v MIBP} [2016] FCA 680 at [32].

\(^{164}\) Department of Home Affairs, Complementary Protection Guidelines, section 3.6.3, as re-issued 29 February 2020.
authorities set out above.165 However, this question may be the subject of further judicial consideration.

Section 36(2B)(c) requires a decision-maker to determine whether the risk faced by an applicant is a risk faced by the population of the country generally, not to the population in a particular area of the country such as a particular city or province. In BCX16 v MIBP, the Federal Court held that a risk to which a person is exposed by virtue of their residence in a specific area of the country is a risk faced by that person personally, notwithstanding that other persons residing in the same area are exposed to the same degree of risk.166 This principle is particularly relevant for decision-makers to bear in mind when considering claims of generalised non-targeted violence by virtue of residence in a particular area or region of a receiving country.

Protection of a third country

Both s 36(2)(a) and s 36(2)(aa) refer to persons in respect of whom Australia has protection obligations. Section 36(3) of the Act qualifies these criteria, by providing that Australia is not taken to have protection obligations in respect of a non-citizen who has not taken all possible steps to avail himself or herself of a right to enter and reside in, whether temporarily or permanently and however that right arose or is expressed, any country apart from Australia, including countries of which the non-citizen is a national. Before finding that an applicant is a person in respect of whom Australia has protection obligations under one of the criteria in s 36(2), a decision-maker must be satisfied that s 36(3) does not apply to that applicant.

Sections 36(4), (5) and (5A) limit the operation of s 36(3) by providing for circumstances in which s 36(3) does not apply. Broadly, these are where the applicant has either a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, or where there are substantial grounds for believing that there would be a real risk of significant harm to the applicant, either in respect of the country to which the applicant has a right to enter or reside, or in respect of another country, where the applicant has a well-founded fear of being returned to that other country by the first country.

165 In AXD17 v MIBP [2018] FCA 161 the Federal Court commented that ‘there may be circumstances, in which for Australia to return a person to their country of origin may be to expose them to a sufficiently real and personal risk of harm without them being targeted as an individual or member of a relevant group, and thereby result in s 36(2B)(c) not having relevant application’: at [71]. However, this comment was made in the context of the Court’s consideration of a ground of appeal that was rejected on the basis that the claim had not been made and therefore these comments appear to be obiter only. See also SZSFF v MIBP [2013] FCCA 1884, where the Federal Circuit Court made obiter comments endorsing a submission by the Minister to the effect that where serious human rights violations in a particular country are so widespread or so severe that almost anyone would potentially be affected by them, this may disclose a sufficiently real and personal risk: at [34], [49]. See also CLJ15 v MIBP [2018] FCA 1638 where the Federal Court held that the Tribunal did not commit a jurisdictional error by incorrectly adopting the more generous approach endorsed in SZSFF as opposed to that in SZSP T: at[50]–[51].

166 BCX16 v MIBP [2019] FCA 465 at [37]–[38]. The Court held that the Tribunal erred by comparing the risk faced by the appellant with the risk faced by other citizens of Kabul and concluding that any risk of serious harm was not faced by the appellant personally because it was one faced by other people residing there. The Court’s interpretation of s 36(2B)(c) was based on analysis of the interrelationship between (c) and the relocation exclusion in s 36(2B)(a): see [37]–[41]. See also BXY15 v MIBP [2018] FCCA 2896 at [110].
Complementary Protection

The issues which arise in relation to consideration of s 36(3) to (5A) are discussed in detail in Chapter 9 – Third country protection.

Ineligibility for grant of a protection visa

Section 36(2C) of the Act sets out five circumstances in which an applicant will be taken not to satisfy the complementary protection criterion in s 36(2)(aa). These relate to the commission of serious crimes by the non-citizen before entering Australia. For visa applications made on or after 16 December 2014, s 36(1C), which is expressed in near identical terms to s 36(2C)(b), will also prevent the grant of a protection visa.

Crimes against peace, war crimes, crimes against humanity, serious non-political crimes and acts contrary to purposes and principles of UN

Section 36(2C)(a) provides that a person will be taken not to satisfy the complementary protection criterion if:

• the Minister has serious reasons for considering that the applicant has committed a crime against peace, a war crime or a crime against humanity, as defined by international instruments prescribed by the regulations (s 36(2C)(a)(i));

• the Minister has serious reasons for considering that the applicant has committed a serious non-political crime before entering Australia (s 36(2C)(a)(ii)); or

• the Minister has serious reasons for considering that the applicant has been guilty of acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations (s 36(2C)(a)(iii));

For the purposes of s 36(2C)(a)(i), each international instrument that defines a crime against peace, a war crime, and a crime against humanity is prescribed by reg 2.03B of the Migration Regulations 1994 (Cth). The regulation provides a non-exhaustive list of instruments as examples.167

The exclusions contained in s 36(2C)(a) mirror those under art 1F of the Refugees Convention which form a part of the Minister’s consideration as to whether the non-citizen is a person in respect of whom Australia has protection obligations under the Refugees Convention - that is, a refugee – for the purposes of s 36(2)(a) as in force prior to 16

---

167 These are: Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, done at Rome on 17 July 1998; the Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals of the European Axis, signed at London on 8 August 1945; the Charter of the International Military Tribunal, signed at London on 8 August 1945; the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, approved in New York on 9 December 1948; The First Convention within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions Act 1957 (Ch); The Second Convention within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions Act 1957 (Ch); The Third Convention within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions Act 1957 (Ch); The Fourth Convention within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions Act 1957 (Ch); Protocol I within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions Act 1957 (Ch); Protocol II within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions Act 1957 (Ch); the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II), done at Geneva on 8 June 1977; the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, adopted by the United Nations Security Council on 25 May 1993; and the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1
December 2014. These provisions are intended to provide the same exclusion to the complementary protection regime as applies to those claiming protection under the Refugees Convention. This is reflected in the language adopted in s 36(2C)(a) which is almost identical to that in art 1F of the Refugees Convention. Similar wording is contained in the s 5H(2) exclusion criteria which forms part of the codified definition of ‘refugee’ in s 5H. As such, the same considerations should be applied when determining whether a person is ineligible for a protection visa under s 36(2C)(a), as when determining whether art 1F or s 5H(2) operates in respect of a person.

It should be noted that despite the parallels between s 36(2C)(a) and art 1F and s 5H(2), there is a point of distinction. While art 1F and s 5H(2) are part of the respective definitions of ‘refugee’ and therefore inform whether a non-citizen is a person in respect of whom Australia has protection obligation under the Refugees Convention, s 36(2C) does not purport to remove Australia’s non-refoulement obligations that may apply to persons meeting the complementary protection criterion in s 36(2)(aa). That is, the non-refoulement obligations under the CAT and ICCPR are such that those persons who would otherwise meet the complementary protection criterion but are found to be not eligible for a protection visa by the operation of these additional exclusion criteria would not be removed from Australia to the country of reference while the real risk of suffering significant harm continues. In such cases, the person would be managed towards case resolution.

For a detailed discussion on the concepts of ‘serious reasons for considering’, ‘war crimes’, ‘crimes against peace’, ‘crimes against humanity’ ‘serious non-political crimes’ and ‘acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the UN, see Chapter 7 – Exclusion and cessation.

Danger to the Australian community

Under s 36(2C)(b), a non-citizen is taken not to satisfy the complementary protection criterion in s 36(2)(aa) if the Minister considers, on reasonable grounds, that the non-citizen:

- is a danger to Australia’s security; or
- is a danger to the Australian community, having been convicted by a final judgment of a particularly serious crime (including a crime that consists of the commission of a serious Australian offence or serious foreign offence).

As with s 36(2C)(a), these provisions are designed to provide parallel exclusions to those under the Refugees Convention. The terms of s 36(2C)(b) are reflective of art 33(2) of the Refugees Convention, which indicates that similar considerations are to apply in its interpretation. For further discussion on art 33, Chapter 7 – Exclusion and cessation.
Note that despite the parallels with art 33, s 36(2C)(b) operates somewhat differently. Article 33 applies to a person who has been recognised as a refugee. It does not form part of the consideration of whether a non-citizen is a refugee and therefore a person in respect of whom Australia has protection obligations for the purposes of s 36(2)(a). Section 36(2C)(b) in contrast, inserts consideration of art 33 type issues into the actual assessment of whether an applicant is a person in respect of whom Australia has protection obligations, and to this extent, can be seen as a requirement additional to that associated with the refugee criterion.

For protection visa applications made on or after 16 December 2014, s 36(1C) excludes an applicant from the grant of a protection visa on security grounds expressed in similar terms to s 36(2C)(b), regardless of whether they meet the complementary protection criterion or refugee criterion. Although s 36(1C) will operate to prevent the grant of a visa to applicants who meet the refugee criterion but pose a risk to Australia’s security, it appears unnecessary in the context of complementary protection, given that such applicants are unable to meet s 36(2)(aa) by operation of s 36(2C)(b).

Limitations on the Migration and Refugee Division of the AAT’s jurisdiction in relation to these provisions are discussed at Chapter 12 – Merits Review of Protection Visa Decisions.

security of the country in which he is) and not to the second circumstance (having been convicted by a final judgement of a particularly serious crime, constitutes a danger to the community of that country): SZOQQ v MIAC (2012) 200 FCR 174 at [49], [11] (although the High Court subsequently held that those proceedings had miscarried, the Court’s reasoning was left undisturbed: SZOQQ v MIAC (2013) 259 CLR 577). In contrast, the structure of s 36(2C)(b) appears to require that there be ‘reasonable grounds’ for considering that either of these circumstances exist. Thus, a different threshold may apply to each of the two tests.

172 The expression ‘a person to whom Australia has protection obligations’ in s 36(2)(a) means no more than a person who is a refugee under art 1 of the Convention and does not call for consideration of art 33 or s 91U (which elaborates on the concept of ‘particularly serious crime’ in art 33(2)): SZOQQ v MIAC (2013) 259 CLR 577 at [30]–[31]. The Court unanimously rejected the Minister’s argument that s 91U somehow changes the operation of s 36(2)(a).

173 Section 36(1C) was inserted by the Migration and Maritime Powers Legislation Amendment (Resolving the Asylum Caseload Legacy) Act 2014 (Cth) (No 135 of 2014).